responsibility. He pointed out that the terms were not out permanently the six Ulster counties and he went on to sketch out a system of Government for Ireland for the future while the war was going on, which was to be called Home Rule, and afterwards a system of Home Rule which gradually amounted to a declaration of war on the Irish people.

on the principle of Justice to all small and oppressed nationalities, how could the claim of the Nationalists for Home Rule be denied? Mr. Patrick O'Brien (consistently) seconded the motion.

MR. ASQUITH'S REPLY

The Prime Minister, in reply, admitted that he was as much a party to the negotiations as Mr. Lloyd George, but claimed that they were not negotiators, but had to submit the matter to the Cabinet. Lord Lansdowne had no special responsibility, as his Ulster colleagues had the same.

MR. REDMOND'S PROTEST

Mr. John Redmond, who was received with cheers, said that before expressing his view he desired very briefly to refer to the movement of the new general election which had been discussed that afternoon. He had complete sympathy with the right hon. gentleman who spoke of the new atmosphere which had surrounded the Irish question.

THE HOME RULE ACT

He pointed out that the Home Rule Act was not a simple matter, but one which had far-reaching consequences. He expressed his regret that the Government had not done more to prepare the public mind for the coming of Home Rule.

THE NATIONALIST PARTY

He pointed out that the Nationalist Party was not a party of division, but a party of unity. He expressed his confidence in the leadership of Mr. Lloyd George and his belief that the Government would do all that was possible to secure the best interests of the Irish people.

THE IRISH QUESTION

He pointed out that the Irish question was a complex one, involving the interests of all the people of Ireland. He expressed his belief that the Government would do all that was possible to secure the best interests of the Irish people.
