

ought to be done necessary to acknowledge the independence of the Irish Parliament.

The House in Committee on the Popery bill, Mr. Gardner read the third clause in respect to the education of Roman Catholics. It was his opinion that this clause and the one which followed it, in regard to marriage, should come in as separate bills.

Mr. Fitzgibbon said, he would give the bill all the assistance in his power, if it went to encourage foreign education. The Catholics had by the former clauses been granted property of land and liberty of religion. The protestants had gone more than half way to meet them, and it was time for them to be forward in meeting the Protestants. On the other hand he could see no objection they could make to sending their children to Protestant's schools. The University was open for them, though they could not obtain degrees in the University.

He said there was a law in being to punish Roman Catholic parents for sending their children to be educated in foreign countries; but it was not a law as no gentlemen in that House would wish to see put in force; it was a disgrace to our statutes; and would be a disgrace to the most uncivilized country in the world. It was a law wrote in blood, and no court in this country would enforce it; it was made a few years ago to punish a gentleman of that persuasion for educating his children in France; but the charge was reprobated, on account of the severity of the statute.

He said that it was impossible to render the Roman Catholics of this country faithful to its free constitution, without educating them at home, or in England; for when instructed in schools under a despotic government, they imbibe those disgraceful tenets, that were most dangerous to the liberties of a people, and therefore was determined to hazard the fate of the whole bill, unless some even one day, was necessary.

The clause was accordingly adjourned to this day.

He was followed by four other Members, and Mr. Brownlow thought it better to drop all the two clauses already granted, than to endanger the bill in the Lords, by adding the others. This was opposed by Mr. Ogle.

A clause was proposed for repealing a part of an act of Queen Anne, as allowed a punishment to be levied on the Roman Catholic inhabitants of a county, to make good damages committed in the time of war. This was agreed to unanimously.

Another clause was proposed to be inserted, to repeal the law now in being for preventing Roman Catholics from holding houses or lands in the City or Suburbs of Limerick or Galway. — This was also agreed to.

A clause was likewise received for repealing that part of the act which prevented a Roman Catholic from having in his possession, of his own property, a sum of more than the value of £1.
