made their Observations:—I leave them to judge of the Immoralities, as well as unbecoming Expressions made Use of, proceeding from the natural Invectives of a Group of ill-bred Reptiles.

They have strenuously endeavoured, with all the Rhetoric which they were possessed of, and could hire, to excite the esteemed Body of ARTIFICERS of this City, to load me with re-proaches, for innocently vindicating the egregious Offence given to them in the public Papers by Mr. IRWIN, which they are pretty well assured of ere now. These ingenious and estimable Class of Men, far from being guided by any insignificant Pretenders to Art, and thinking their silly Insinuations an Insult on them would resent their Presumption publicly, had it not been in respect to their Consequence above inferior Cavils, and at the same time they assure me, that *humble and true Merit alone, shall meet with Encouragement, or dare sue for an Assylum in the ancient CITY of LI-

It is well known in this City, that the above mentioned Hirelings never aspired much higher than to have an imperfect Idea of the bare Rudiments of their Profession: That ridiculous Piece of Nonsense printed in their Names, was (as I have remarked above) planned-out at their common Place of Rendezvous, under the Inspection of their admired Darlings (Mr. Irwin and his Friend,) as one of the Parties subscribed thereto informed me, in Presence of a respectable Citizen, when like a dissem-bling and cringing Hypocrite, he wanted to dive into the secret recesses of my Mind; but this refined Blockhead as ignorant at our parting as before, had no Cause to exult on his Success; still I am informed he denies being concerned in this Affair;—this again demonstrates his disguised Inclination; but as nothing indicates the Mind more than Words or Actions,—I have him in Miniature, which I would properly describe, but that my maintaining an Argument against an illiterate Ass, would be justly construed as an Instance of Vanity in me, by any judicious Man.

I leave it to any Man of Sense to judge how mean and unlike Artists it is, to be made Catpaws of, and to indulge their sottish, drunken Appetites, have revolted against the rest of their Faculty, in Favor of a silly, presumptuous Coxcomb, who purchased their Votes at an extraordinary Expence. This envious Critic prompts his procured Accomplices to object to my Confutation of his misapprehended, and consequently false Doctrine: I would, in this place exhibit to the public, in the easiest and plainest Terms, a convincing Demonstration of the Inconsistency and Inaccuracy of his wonderful Discovery, grounded only on Opinion, inasmuch as he cannot draw any solid Inferences from the Principles on which he seems to ground his Arguments, but that my entering into such a Detail would be too long a Digression. He and his petty Scribblers, have also endeavoured to disrecommend me to the Gentlemen Professors of this City, by construing my last Address to the Public in a wrong Sense; therefore, I think it my duty to undeceive such as may be prepossessed in Favor of their ill construed Imputations, by declaring to the Public, that I did not mean to prejudice the good Name or Character of any Individual, much less did I direct my Sentiments to Mortal, but to James
