They write from Berlin, that the powers of our great Monarch decline very fast, though his heart is still warm with military ardour, and faithful to its martial fires. It is however, the general opinion, that he never will be able to take the field again, as his constitution is too much debilitated for such exertions.

D U B L I N, January 15.
The Duke of Leinster being announced by some of the papers as a friend to the Reform, and, if true, add immortal honor to his Grace's character, and be an happy augmentation to the side of virtue—besides the weight his Grace's dignity must give to the measure, his interest in the House of Commons is powerful; and as he will, by taking such a part, sacrifice his present interest, it argues that his conduct on the occasion must be the result of a well founded conviction.

A very opulent company have established a coal-yard at Athy, and have for some time past been buying up all the Kilkenny coals they can procure, in order to take advantage of the first opening of the Grand Canal, to supply the city of Dublin, and all the country through which the Canal runs, with that excellent fuel.

The number of criminals who escape from justice for non-prosecution, is alarming; particularly in the case of the White-boys at Kilkenny. Were the Judges a little more rigid in the punishment of misprision of felony, the public peace would experience the greater benefit.

Yesterday one of the soldiers, convicted some time since of robbery in the Phoenix-Park, was executed at Gallows-hill, near Kilmainham. The other is respited, and it is expected will receive a pardon, owing, as we hear, to his having prevented his companion from murdering the party whom they had robbed.

Last night at nine o'Clock, a fire broke out in Blackmore-yard, at the book-warehouse of Caleb Jenkin, Esq; and though every possible assistance was given, yet on account of the scarcity of water, which prevented the engines from being properly supplied, the ware-house was burnt to the ground.
