Chancellor of the Exchequer. I am sorry I am again obliged to repeat what I have so often mentioned to Gentlemen, who contend that the expences of Government should be limited by the revenues of the kingdom; then, surely, on their own principles, it is unfair to reduce those revenues; if they desire Government to maintain itself on a certain sum, is it just to take a large part of that sum away? it is not; and I must vote against the hon. Gentleman's motion.

The country being alarmed, and so much enraged, immediately pursued the delinquents and in less than 3 hours seized several of the villains, whom with F—d are now safely lodged in Castlebar goal.

How ridiculous must those personages appear who took such extraordinary pains to excite the fears of the nation—who talked so loudly of forcible possessions, that defied alike the civil and military powers! yet a single magistrate has come forward, unasked, and offers to reinstate the legal owners in possession of the lands in the counties of Roscommon and Galway, which have given rise to such calumny and rumour, on the detection of which so many changes have been rung to the prejudice of the national character.

The supineness of the injured party, on the above affair, most certainly merits reprehension, as it has been a channel for conveying groundless odium on the character of the nation; and from the above circumstance, it is more than probable, a proper representation of it to the adjacent magistrates would have at once crushed it in its infancy.
