The Court therefore postponed passing judgment until the principals were convicted.

Mr. Stanley then declared, that he would consider between that and Monday, whether any motion could be made to arrest the judgment.

Monday, June 12.

The Court passed sentence on the principals, and then ordered Mr. Fitzgerald to be brought up for judgment.

Mr. Stanley declared, that the more he revolved the trial of Mr. Fitzgerald in his mind, the more he was convinced that the trial was irregular; and that he would shew it if the facts were on the record; but without that, it was impossible to sustain any motion in arrest of judgment. He said, he had no doubt but Mr. Fitzgerald was safe in their Lordships hands, and that if any advantages could be derived from the nicety or caution of the law, he was sure their Lordships would feel it as much their inclination as it was their duty to give the unfortunate gentleman the full benefit of those advantages.

The Court with great humanity, declared they wished that Mr. Attorney General had consented to discharge the jury, as that would have removed all doubt. The Court threw it out in the beginning, as an expedient, which they submitted to the Attorney General, but as he had not thought fit to consent, the Court could do nothing new; but Mr. Baron Power declared, he thought procuring a murder, was a distinct substantive, and independent act of treason.

The Chief Baron then addressed Mr. Fitzgerald and said, he was sorry to say, after a very tedious trial, in which Mr. Fitzgerald had the assistance of very able council, he was found guilty of a most horrid murder, and that he must then pass the sentence of the law, which he accordingly did; and he was executed at 8 o'clock that evening.

It is imagined Mr. Hastings' impeachment will turn out like that of Sir Robert Walpole—his conduct will be justified on the plea of political necessity.

Lieutenant D——ll, of the Carbineers, being the gentleman who commanded the party sent to apprehend Fitzgerald, took him out of a chest where he had concealed himself under a heap of blankets. The compassion of this gentleman was extended to the last moment of the unhappy man's exit. When Fitzgerald was told the guard waited to conduct him to execution, he remarked to Mr. D——ll, that as he knew a great number of ladies filled all the windows in the way to the hill, and as thousands were anxiously waiting to gratify the fight with his melancholy progress, he would baulk their curiosity, and go a back way to the place of execution. "Have spirit and generosity enough, Sir, said he, to assist me on this trying occasion, and do not refuse me your arm to the fatal spot." The officer assented, as a circumstance tending to compose his mind, and he accordingly took him under the arm to the gallows. When arrived at the foot of the ladder, he desired the executioner to mount, which having complied with, he rapidly followed him, and the moment the rope was tied, flung himself off like M'Naghton, and like him too broke the rope, and prolonged his misery in waiting for another.

On Saturday last a very singular occurrence in the annals of Free Masonry took place in London and in Dublin; it being the festival of St. John the Baptist, the Right Hon. Lord Viscount Kilwarlin presided in the Grand Lodge in London as locum tenens to the Right Hon. the Earl of Antrim, who is Grand Master of England, while at the same time the Earl of Antrim presided here in the Grand Lodge as locum tenens for Lord Kilwarlin, who is Grand Master of Ireland.

The reports circulated, that Fitzgerald had received money from his mother and Lord Bristol to support his defence, seem to be ill founded, as he was drove to the greatest straits for money, and had not enough to see his lawyers decently. The beggarly appearance he made at his trial was through mere necessity, and as he would not be hanged by the same executioner who had dispatched Brecknock and Fulton, he prevailed upon a fellow in the prison, with his two or three last guineas, and the promise of what cloaths he wore, to perform, as a friend, that melancholy office.

We hear a chapter of the most illustrious order of St. Patrick will be held in Dublin Castle the first week in October next.

Yesterday, between four and five hundred White Boys assembled at Newport and tendered oaths to every person they could possibly meet. The priest of the parish was in the chapel and attempted to escape through a window, but they pursued him, brought him in his vestments into the street and made him declare that he would take only five shillings for a marriage, and eighteen pence for a christening.

The County of Limerick has been fatal to the White Boys, who ought to remember the fate of Banyard and Carthy, who with many others, dug up some ground near Kilmann in January 1762; a special commission was issued to try them; they were found guilty and executed at Gallows Green the 19th of June, 1762. Banyard was carried to a house at Black boy, where he lived in great agony for eleven hours after he was hanged.

The late unfortunate Fitzgerald shed his life to the violated laws of the country, has, no doubt, exhibited many instances of the most tried courage, nay extreme of rashness, though he has sometimes refused to fight, when even yet surrounded.—He struck a Major Bagges in publick assemblies in Paris, wounding the King of the Blood and the first No. 1, the punishment for which is confinement in the Bastille; the Major surviving to great an affront drew his sword which the guards rushed forward to seize the latter, for the blow which was first given was so sudden as not to be perceived by any one present. Fitzgerald only made his escape to his lodging house officer, though committed to prison, represented the affair in such a manner that an order was issued for apprehending him, but by the interposition of the Duke of Artois the whole matter was passed over. These two gentlemen afterwards agreed to pair to the confines of France to fight a duel were attended by their seconds, on whom was Colonel O'Toole, belonging to the 1st Irish Brigades, and next in command to the Duke of Orleans, who was on the side of the unhappy countryman. By a written agreement the parties were first to fire at each other at a limited distance, and afterwards to advance what advantage they thought proper;—they both went on one knee to fire, when the Major was wounded in the cap of one of his knees, and Fitzgerald stepped, consequently both were then lame; the former then hopped up on the other's back and fired his other pistol, and missed his antagonist, and the latter did the same, and advanced so close to the other, that he undoubtedly have shot him through the breast, had not Fitzgerald thrown one of his discharged pistols with full force at Mr. Bagges, which disconcerted him in such a manner that he missed his aim, and then the Major stepped in return at the other. They then called for more powder and ball, which the seconds would not admit of, and interposed. This was the only incident in the duel.
