which they were charged, and to whose lenity it was owing that they were not indicted for crimes, a conviction of which would have fubjected them to a much more dreadful judgment The object of the learned Judge was arrained, for they appeared penitent, and were fentibly affected by the awful folemnity of the proceeding.

Immediately after, an application was made on behalf of the Crown to postpone the trials of the Right Boys, on affidavits stating the ablence of material witnesses, and that others had been fuborned and intimidated by the traverters. These affidavits were canvalled with great ingenuity and ability on the other fide, and as ably supported on the other, and a case determined at Carlow, by the fame Judge, having been cited, it was supposed the trials would have been brought on. However, the Judge to the clearest manner, and by reasons faisfactory to every man who heard them, thewest the impeffibility of bringing on the trials, confident with the justice which was due to the public; and it having been urged, that the profecution was carried on by government, supported by a phalanx of crown lawyers, and that therefore the contell was not by any means foir or equal, he faid, that in his fituation he would not confider by whom the profecutive was carried on; but inalmuch as it had been avowed on both fides to be a governmeni profecution, he must, as a person much interested in the peace of the nation, fay he confidered the interference of government highly meritorious, and that he should not helitate to fay it would be unworthy of its powers, if it had remained fupine when tumults, approaching to high treason, had nearly frightened the island from her propriety: For his part, he thought that its moderate and prudent conduct should endear it to the nation, and he fincerely hoped would prevent fuch a delage of blood as was heretofore necessary to ftop the progress of a similar disorder; that as to the cafe determined at Carlow, it was totally different. --- Here the counfel who cited it got up, and with great propriety acknowledged that the cafes were different.
