Yesterday at one o'clock in the afternoon, his Excellency the Lord Chancellor held a Court in the great Committee-room of the House of Lords, for the purpose of examining Mr. John Magee, on the subject of a petition preferred to his Lordship, stating a derangement of his, the faid Magee's, mental faculties. Mr. Magee having previously been brought to the Court from his confinement, by the High Sheriff, the buliness was opened by the Counsel for the petitioner; after which his Lordilip proceeded to examine Mr. Magee, who, though at first much affected by his very critical and diffressful fituation, (fo much as to flied tome tears) answered every question propounded to him, with such clearnels, perspicuity and precision, that his Lordship, without hesitation, declared the allegations or grounds of the petition unfubitantiated, and accordingly difmiffed the procedure.

The Counsel with the Petitioner, (a near relation of Mr. Magee's) were the Recorder and

Mr. Serjeant Duquery.

Paoli behaved for a long time like a brave General, when the Corficans, were endeavouring to recover their liberties, from the Genoele, and even when the latter found themselves infufficient to subdue those gallant Islanders, and that the French were called in, that General headed the Citizens against a large army which had been fent over to subdue that small Kingdom, but fled to England before matters came to desperate as to justify such a measure, and then accepted of a pension from the Court of England—On this accout his patriotism appears rather doubtful to many of his countrymen, and in the struggle for constitutional freedom in that Ifland, will not be relied on, courage and honour fo juftly attributed to his brave country in every part of the world, during the reigns of five fuccessive Monarchs, should undoubtedly receive a pension proportionably augmented. Thirty-five pounds or guineas a year, feems not too great a recompence for the imminent dangers, hair-breath 'scapes, and enormous fatigues of so long and painful a fervice, and would do infinitely more honour to his Majesty's justice and patriotifin, than all the civil pentions on the formidable lift of Irish Concordatum since his accession to the Throne.

We hear that feveral young Gentlemen of this City intend performing a play for the benefit of the Poor House; when youthful ability is exerted to amuse the Publick, for such a laudable and uleful purpofe, we doubt not but they will meet a just and merited applause from a numerous and genteel audience.

Saturday Thomas Molony, Catherine Graidie, and Margaret Madigan, who were fentenced for transportation in the County Court, as also two convicts from Tralee, were tranfmitted to Dublin, from thence to be shipped for Nova Scotia.
