

tween themselves, in which the moderate and rational Catholics were overpowered. He adverted to Dr. Troy's Pamphlet, which asserts the infallibility of general councils as a fundamental principle of their religion—he then read the decrees of some of those councils against heretics and heretical Princes—he mentioned the powers assumed by the Popish Convention, of levying taxes upon their community for defraying the expences of their claims and proceedings, which were they fair, just and open, required no such support. He wished to resist further innovation, and foresaw, in granting more than the present bill gave, a total separation from England, or an Union with her—each to be equally dreaded.

[We find ourselves at present inadequate to a more perfect account of his Lordship's speech; but we hope to offer it more fully in a future Paper.

The Archbishop of Cashel said he had not when he came into the House, intended to trouble their Lordships with a single word in the present stage of a bill containing so much various matter, he had determined to reserve his opinion for the time when it should be in Committee, where every Lord would have leisure and opportunity to adopt such part of it as he might think advantageous, and reject what appeared injurious to the country: but a Right Rev. Prelate, for whom personally he entertained the highest esteem, has run out into such a violent and unwarrantable strain of invective against their Lordships' ancestors, against the ancestors of all the Protestants of Ireland, against the Protestant Government, against the truth of history, and against the Protestant Religion itself, that he felt it his duty, as a very unworthy member of the Protestant Church (considering the situation he possessed in it) to stand up in defence of the Protestant ancestry of their Lordships, and the other Protestants of Ireland, in defence of truth, in defence of the Protestant Religion.

The Earl of Farnham said, the bill went to bestow civil and military appointments; the army, said he, is the army of the Empire—and military appointments bestowed in this country may not be legal in any other, to which the army in the usual change of service will be removed. He gave notice, that in the Committee he would therefore move, "that Military appointments should not be granted to the Roman Catholics in Ireland, until such time as they had been granted to the Roman Catholics in England."

The Bishop of Cork concluded a very eloquent speech with the following words:—His Majesty has recommended indulgences to the Roman Catholics; this bill was introduced by the Minister into the other House; it is to be presumed therefore, that his Majesty gives it his approbation, because he gives his countenance to the Minister who brought it forward.—I vote for it as the means of preserving the Protestant Establishment—it strengthens the King's Government—and if I cannot place round the Altar a sufficient defence, I will place the Altar near the Throne.

Lord Dunfany said, to his knowledge the Roman Catholics were loyal and faithful subjects, and thought as little of the Pope as their Lordships did of their Door-keepers; notwithstanding what Doctor Troy might say to the

of his subjects and the admission of Catholics—and there were many others in Germany.—As he observed, he said, a spirit of unanimity prevail he would not say more, than that at the early part of the Session he expected to vote for an enlargement of the Roman Catholics in 1793.

The question was then put by the Lord Chancellor, "that the bill be committed to Friday," and agreed to nemine dissentiente.

Since the commencement of our Assizes, the following persons were capitally convicted:—In the County Court, John Kennelly found guilty of two burglaries, and a rape.—In the City Court, Denis Lyons and James Lawler, for a burglary and robbery in the house of Mary M'Nemara at Annacotty;—and Thomas O'Donnell, writing-clerk, for uttering a Note, knowing the same to be forged.

Thursday night, a Gentleman coming out of the Mercantile Coffee-House, had his heels tripped up by a shabby looking fellow, (as if by accident) when one of those female wretches who infest the streets at night, immediately came up to the Gentleman with an offer of cleansing his clothes, but at the same time found means to make off with his Gold Watch; it was however luckily recovered next morning by Mr. Fall, High Constable.

Yesterday Edmond Welsh, had a very large Adeptous Tumor Pendulous from the right shoulder, taken off in the Hospital, and he continues in a very fair way of recovery; it had been on the creature for eighteen years.

This morning a Stable, in one of the lanes near the Market-house, fell down, by which accident one Man (the hostler) and five horses were killed on the spot;—two other horses were desperately bruised.
