From the accounts received relative to the late tal defeat of the Austro-Sardinian army in the enoese territories, we find, that from the exeme feverity of the weather, and the depth of ow, no attack whatever was expected. This tenfenels of cold, early in December, in a part Italy lying between 44 and 45 of north latiide, near nine degrees more foutherly than our tuation, is to be accounted for from the Appeine Mountains, of prodigious height, covering he Republic of Genoa on one fide, and the wind slowing mottly over the Alps, which are but at fmall distance, during the winter season, tho' n fummer the heat is confiderably greater than a this country; it, however, points out, that neither natural impediments, or strength of situation, could resist the impetuosity of the French.
