

to place us in a state of security, and give to defensive action against foreign or domestic enemies. We received much pleasure on Saturday, from examination of a machine constructed for the conveyance of troops. In the exterior of the perch of a carriage are inserted iron rods, through which thick ropes are very tight forming at each side and length a support for the backs of the soldiers, who are seated in two lines opposite to each other. An awning may also be suspended over their heads, to protect them against rain. The vehicle will accommodate 18 to 20 men, and seems calculated to move with celerity and ease. An experiment was made with it on Saturday—two horses were harnessed to it, but from the stiffness of the wheels, made the draft difficult, the number of horses did not seem sufficient for the purpose. A great objection in this kind of carriage, and claiming our observation, is its contiguity to the ground, and its being open at all sides, by which it is exposed to difficulty or embarrassment to the soldiery, in changing position and form in a moment; but it would be an improvement of great importance if seated back, on the principle of a jaunting car, for which means, in case of attack, they could keep their assailants, although in motion.

Yesterday orders were issued from Government for military and yeomanry, on guard in this city, to stop passengers in the streets, or ask to look through the ports, until after the hour of eleven—but the regulations adopted at the bridges and outposts are to be observed, and all public houses to be kept closed immediately after nine o'clock.

The vacant blue riband, by the death of the Duke of Beaufort, we hear, is bestowed upon our highly esteemed Viceroy, the Earl of Wicklow—a gift which is the more honourable, as it was not solicited, but which it seems has been well deserved, for that illustrious noble's excellent governing in this country.
