To the Proprietor of the Limerick Gazette.

"Was I not Free—and am I not a Slave."

That all men are born with the same right to Freedom, is an assertion generally subscribed to: that thousands, nay millions, are groaning under the arbitrary lash of unmanly oppression, is also a fact disgraceful to a British Constitution, and harrowing to British feelings. Is it not of all things the most natural to suppose, that these Creatures instigated by a laudable, and in this instance, just spirit of revenge, should endeavour to retort (if ever in their power) their unparalleled punishment on white men.—Was not the assassination of almost all the latter in St. Domingo (considering the stimulative thereto) just and natural in the extreme?—Oh! how degrading to barter Gold for a Human Being—that Being, possessing in common with us, every faculty we inherit from nature—the same passions, feelings, senses, affections—and what's the difference?

"Color non est idem."
—they are Blacks—yes, they differ from us in color. And is it for this, O Africans! that ye are dragged from your native land—torn from your wives, children, parents—in fine, all the ties dear to one that bears resemblance to a human form—is it for this that you are transported into climes, where you are doomed to suffer torments unprecedented in the annals of Barbarism, and excruciating in the extreme—torments that the most refinedly vitious imaginations can devise: because you do not watch the looks—anticipate the desire, and are not ready to obey the very signals of your unfeeling tormentors—who consider you in no other light, than as people born to be their slaves, and predestined as such by the Omnipotent Being.

methinks I see the poor heart-broken emaciated victim, at the close of a broiling, scorching day, leaning on his spade, while numberless drops drawn from his very vitals bedew his rugged front—while busy memory presents to his tortured fancy his far distant home—his disconsolate wife and orphans labouring under the sad oppression of misery and want: lamenting the loss of him, they are never, never more to behold. Hope, eager hope, quits her seat in his mind, and the gloom of despair is substituted;—methinks I see him dropping in agony on his knees, and in the fullness of his heart, implore HIS GOD to end at once his sufferings and his being. But soft—let me draw a veil over this picture—it is too horrid—too dreadful for the inspection of any mind not naturalized to such degrading sights!—But unhappy victims of oppression, your sufferings are now nearly at an end—a British Constitution will not much longer suffer your horrid traffic, a British Minister, and now at Britannia's helm (may he long steer there), has expressed his wish of giving "Freedom to all Men,"*—of healing your gaping wounds—restoring you to that country, that wife, and those children; whence you have been barbarously dragged.

Yes, Africans, you may now look forward to the enjoyment of that happiness, of which on earth you have been hitherto deprived, and gratitude warming your hearts, you will henceforth teach your little offspring to lip forth the names of a British Ministry—of a Fox—a Grenville—and a Grattan—in accents expressive of their heartfelt gratitude, love, and everlasting esteem.

PHILANTHROPIST.

Limerick, 13th June, 1806.

* This was Mr. Fox's toast on a late occasion.

On Monday last, Captain Fitz-Gerald commenced cutting down his meadows at Burton-Hill, county Clare:—when grass of unusual early growth is produced from rye and cow-grass seeds, it shows the advantage of early crops from these artificial grasses in preference to the carcasses, which will not be ready for two months more.

Exports since our last.
