The following is the opinion of a late ingenious writer respecting the fraternity called Quakers :-"What is familiar and near to us, excites little scrutiny or investigation; but the time may come when a wise Legislature will condescend to ehquire, by what medium a whole Society (in both the Old and New World) is made to act and think with uniformity, for upwards of a century; by what policy (without emolument from Government) they have become the only people free from poverty; by what cconomy they have thus prevented beggary and want amongst their Members, whilst the nation groans under the weight of taxes for the poor. They are an industrious, modest, intelligent, and virtuous people, animated with the most beneficial principles. They have a comprehensive charity to all mankind, and deny the mercies of God to none; they publicly aver that an universal liberty is due to all, are against impositions of every kind, though they patiently submit to many themselves, and are perhaps the only people of all mankind, whose practice (as a body) corresponds with their principle."
