Colored Thornton, a gentleman well known on the turf, was lately married to a young lady in Essex. What is become of his sporting wife, who rode the match against Mr. Flint?

On Saturday morning, at two o'clock, a fire broke out in the house of Mr. Courtenay in Moore-street; it began in the shop, and burned through the floor to the kitchen, which awakened the maid servant, who alarmed the family, and by the exertion of the people in the house, and some of the neighbours the fire was extinguished, after having burned or injured every thing in the shop.

A villain who was working in the same field, under pretence of bringing him to an employer, who gave higher wages, inveigled him into the fields, where he knocked him down with the handle of his pitchfork, and afterwards with the prongs, stabbed him repeatedly in the body, which was found the succeeding morning naked, the wretch having fled with the clothes and watch. We sincerely trust, this attroclous murderer will soon be apprehended, and we are happy at feeling this the more likely, as the articles he carried off with him, are calculated to contribute to his being traced to his retreat.

His Grace the Duke of Bedford has since his arrival in this city, shewn a patriotic example for the eucouragement of the manufactures and trade of Ireland, worthy of general emulation. Within these few days a coach for his Grace has been launched from the yard of Mr. Williams, in Mary-street, built since his Graces arrival in this city, and is as much approved of by their Graces of Bedford, in point of beauty and excellence in every particular, as any ever built in London:—Hear this ye importers of English carriages, and take an example of what ye ought to do towards your countrymen, manufacturers and traders, from the conduct pursued by the illustrious Nobleman, whom his Majesty delegated to govern your country
