through the passengers seat in the King George Packet, few will be more lamented than Mr. John Anderson, late of Dublin, merchant, whether his singular worth or his extraordinary misfortune, be considered; this excellent and beloved young man was on his way from London, (where he had been lately happily and advantageously married), to visit his parents and family, who reside in Dublin; he had reached Chester, and was about to set out for Parkgate, when he found that by a blunder of the people of the inn, his baggage (which was marked with his name), had been sent back to London, in the course of the night, upon a supposition that it belonged to another traveller of the same name, who had lain at the same house. Mr. Anderson was obliged to wait until the mistake was rectified, and his goods returned from London. On the day of their arrival the King George sailed, and he left Parkgate in all the anticipated pleasure of a man who was deservedly beloved as a son and a brother, hastening to meet an affectionate family.

A few days ago, the Clergyman of a Parish Church in Dublin, having by some extraordinary occurrence been prevented from attending his duty, at the hour of divine service, a Parishioner whose delight is to be in office, thought he felt himself inspired, and that the Congregation should not be disappointed, he put on the sacerdotal, and proceeded to do the duty of the Clergyman. This modest Citizen, however, found himself not so adequate in this office, as in his own profession, scratching upon copper, and only went through part of the service. His presumption came to the knowledge of a certain learned Doctor, the protector and champion of Mother Church, and well known in the Senate, who sent for Copper-face, and putting on his spectacles when he came before him, to view the usurper of the sacred function, he gave him such a denouncing lecture for his arrogance, with the Doctor's usual coolness of temper, as almost palsied poor Copper-face, and that must for ever extinguish any spark of inspiration he conceived himself to have possessed.

The lately erected wooden bridge, on the river Nore, at Mountgarret, one mile north of New Ross, built at the private expense of messrs. Geo. and Thomas Keough, of Ross, merchants, and counsellor Foote, of Dublin, was opened a few days ago, for the convenience of foot passengers.

Thursday, as a poor man was in the act of praying in the Great Chapel, Waterford, he was seized with a fit of apoplexy, and almost instantly expired.

Last week, as a young woman, in Old Ross, named Neville, was drawing turf from a neighbouring bog, the horse took fright, and bruised her so severely against a wall, that she expired in a few hours after.

A few mornings since, the wife of — Howard, of Ross, veterinarian, was found smothered in her bed. Her death is said to have been caused by inebriation.

with no small degree of satisfaction we receive a communication which has been sent to us, and which we hope in a few days to be to the world as a fact confirmed, that the late explosion of the magazine at Ballynahinch, if true, would be an event truly extraordinary, has been a base and gross fabrication, most invidious and unworthy purposes.—which from General Fox, of a date anterior to the time stated of the transaction happened, takes no notice of such an invention.
