The Town of Chudleigh destroyed by Fire.

About twelve o'clock, on Friday, a fire broke out in a bakehouse, in the town of Chudleigh, in Devonshire, which raged with increasing fury, and, at length, communicated to a house, containing two barrels of gun-powder, which belonged to a person employed in blowing up the rocks, which soon took fire, and blew up with a terrible explosion. The wind being very high, and many houses on each side of the street, covered with thatch, the whole town became a general conflagration. Only one fire engine could be found in the town, and that was soon after burned.— Exeter is the nearest place from which any assistance could be procured, and that being ten miles distant, there was nothing to stop the progress of the flames. The Market-house, and all the houses excepting about seven, at the extreme ends of the town, were consumed. Fortunately, no lives were lost; the church being a little to windward of the flames, was saved, and proved an asylum for the distressed inhabitants, whose situation must be truly deplorable. At three o'clock, Saturday morning, when the Mail-coach, with difficulty, passed through the town, several houses continued burning, and many pigs and horses lay dead in the street.

Anecdote.—His Majesty King George I. made a present of Books to the University of Cambridge, soon after the commencement of the tumults at Oxford, on which occasion Dr. Trapp wrote the following Epigram:—

Our Royal Master saw with heedful eyes
The wants of his two Universities:
Troops he to Oxford sent, as knowing why
That learned body wanted loyalty;
But books to Cambridge gave, as well discerning
That that right loyal body wanted learning.

This epigram received a retort from Sir Wm. Brown, as it is said, impromptu:

The King to Oxford sent a troop of horse,
For Tories know no arguments but force;
With equal care to Cambridge books he sent,
For Whigs allow no force but argument.
