

very important, from Portugal, brought by the Elizabeth packet, from Lisbon, which arrived at Plymouth on the 17th instant.

Wellington found it necessary, in order to avoid being flanked, to retreat to within 20 miles of Lisbon, taken up a position, having his right at Albarque Tagus, and his left at Peniche, on the sea forming a crescent on a chain of hills, all of which were fortified. In this position the grand battle decided the fate of Portugal has, or must be. A very supply was collected within it, and with the country had been drove, and rendered a desert, and the forces are estimated at 70 or 80,000, and with 15,000 Spaniards, was on the south of the river, following Lord Wellington's march. Sir John Wilson with the Portuguese Militia, were on the rear of the enemy.

Without a dreadful and most sanguinary contest, out of the question, as a deputation of English agents had waited on Admiral Berkeley, to remission, in case of need, to ship property on transports, to which the Admiral answered, he would in no case grant any such permission, as there were not sufficient shipping to take away the property at same time stated it as his opinion that there was no cause for apprehension.

They have received Moniteurs to the 10th, but they mention of the battle of the 27th.

Burgh, who was the bearer of Lord Wellington's dispatches, is the only son of the late Thomas Sackville, Esq. of Sackville-street, and not the son of Mr. Sackville Oldtown, as erroneously stated in some of the prints.
