

great horror that we have to relate a calamity far exceeds in the fatal consequences of it, perhaps any casualty ever known. About ten o'clock on Saturday night was heard, proceeding from the quarters so loud and unexpected as to produce sensations of wonder and alarm. Crowds came from whence the roar of destruction proceeded, and in a short time, it was evident that apprehension had not over-calculated the bodings of misfortune. It was discovered that three houses in Brandy-lane had been apparently by gunpowder; that the adjacent were in flames; and from the sad testimony it was clear, that many unfortunate had been the victims of instantaneous destruction—a moment horror and consternation inquired—all was mute amazement—nor by one near this scene of death and ruin for a time, give any relation of the causes of the fatal transaction—while the increasing gazing on the smoking remains of the mangled limbs and bodies of their inhabitants. The cries of those whose dwellings were in flames at length called forth some in a little time, such zealous and generous assistance was made as always distinguish the good of this City, in cases where misfortune claims upon them. The two houses immediately adjoining the conflagration were almost killed down, and the rest were saved from the effects of this dreadful circumstance are not certain, and independent of conjecture; as facts could be collected from the survivors, under the agonies of body and the loss of their dearest relatives, the loss of their little properties, and their own sufferings contributed to produce, it appears, that the name of Ellard, who lived in the ruined houses, had been a workman employed in the powder works at Ballincollig. It is not to be thought to advance what we had in perfect confidence of its accuracy—mention it as the best account we have been able to procure; for the Mayor and Sheriffs have been unwilling to torture the wretched survivors by interrogatories, as to minute particulars of the circumstance.

There are three others in the Infirmary whose recovery scarcely any hopes are entertained. The families of those unfortunate people exhibited a most affecting sight, which, even in description, would excite the feelings of the generality of our countrymen.
