... wieciaim, on the pare, or the cathone body, that any sanction had been given to any such sentiments the amendment was, however, withdrawn, upon the grounds that the circumstance alluded to was beneath the notice of the committee. The question of thanks was then put and carried unanimously.

The following resolution was then put, and likewise carried unanimously-" That it is the opinion of this committee, that the catholic electors of Cork, be forthwith requested to register their voters for the purpose of supporting the true advocate of the catholic cause, the Hon. Hely Hutchinson."

Mr. O'Connell said. that the committee, having been appointed for the purpose for preparing the petitions to Parliament, was now on the point of expiring, these objects having been disposed of, he hoped there was no man in the community that would not admit the catholic cause stood on as high ground as ever. The law he said, prohibited their re-assembling, and they were anxions to prove themselves obedient to the law. They were calumniators who ever said otherwise. Some difference of opinion, that perhaps was the result of better judgment, had arisen among them, but he was convinced that all were actuated by pure and honorable motives. They had in substance and effect agreed, and had endeavoured unanimously to throw off the imputation, that any catholic could be found to have a hand in calumniating the family of Hutchinson. The committee had closed its labours, and they were now bound to return again to an aggregate meeting, and report the details of what they had done. The slight checks they had received had proved the harbinger of certain victory. Their friend, Lord Moira, had proclaimed that the object of their petition was a right, and the word "toleration" was now exploded. Unfettered right of course would be the first act of the Prince's Government, for his friends will never shrink from granting what they have so often asserted to be due .-He entreated gentlemen to look around them and observe that on every side they have been assailed and held up to public derision. That they, who lived by the exercise of their minds had been exposed to endless ridicule. He would candidly admit that however silly their adversaries may have been, that they themselves might have been likewise silly and mistaken, but with no improper motive. They derived no importance from long speeches or from large fortunes, but as being the advocates of four millions of people. He admired the words of Lord Moira, " You may possess rank and titles," said his Lordship, " but your great importance is derived from the people who sent you." The committee were bound to go back to the people, to hear their opinions for the present, and their commands for the future. It would seem to him to be abandoning their claims, if they were not again to demand them not as a favour, but as a right. If the people should agree not to petition, he would assent to their opinion; but if they thought otherwise, then let them prepare a committee-the question of the manner in which that was to be done, was for the consideration of an aggregate meeting only.

There was another subject to which he would call the attention. An aggregate meeting had sent a delegation to London! The duty thereof had been differently done by different individuals. He considered it unfortunate that the voice of the people would not have been deemed final; but it was for the gentlemen themselves to account for their conduct, and it would give him pleasure to hear them do so satisfactorily. He for one should move a vote of thanks to three individuals; namely, Sir Francis Goold, Major O'Brien, and Gwen O'Couner, Esq. He should do so in the event of no other person coming forward for that purpose, for he should think that the catholics would be guilty of ingratitude, were they not to thank those who had obeyed the commands of the people, even if their commands were wrong. It had been asserted that Mr. Pole's letter was partially approved of, but the proposition he conceived was absurd. All the catholic peers opposed it-not only Lord Ffrench whose marliness on that occasion he should ever entertain a grateful recollection of; but Lord Southwell attended, because he heard the the committee was in danger. No catholic had ever any other notion of the circular letter, than that it was a production at once slovenly, bigotted, and tyrannical, originating in subserviency, and intended for treache-
