

present address, the speech of the Noble Lord just spoken would have been alone sufficient to convince him of the necessity of it. That Noble Lord, after stating the necessity of excluding the French from those places of trust and emolument to which they aspired, and to which every generous mind is desirous of reaching, not content with thus declaring that they could not with safety be trusted, also forwarded an accusation against them, an accusation which was untrue, in fact, as it was injurious and in its tendency. It was not true that the Catholics of Ireland demanded concession in the present emergency. Their conduct did not warrant a charge of such a nature: A high legal character in the country was known to have declared his opinion, that the law in which they had proceeded was not conformable to law; it was too much then to say, at a time when the case may be considered as yet pending, that the conduct was in opposition to the laws of the land. The noble Lord was the only thing he could pick out from the speech of the Noble Lord's speech, and this, he was convinced, had little foundation. The noble Lord had said, that the present circumstances of the country did not warrant the present motion;—would ask, what circumstances could possibly be so alarming that those under which the country stood at present? Could they shut their eyes to the fact that the French fleet was in the bay? Would not the fact be so prominent enough to convince them that the state of Ireland was such at present as to inevitably lead to the most disastrous consequences, unless means were speedily adopted to conciliate the people of that country? Was not the salvation of the country in that country and in this such as to demand an extraordinary remedy? Abstracting from other considerations, there was at this moment a want of provisions in Ireland, which alone would be sufficient to excite alarm;—and that at such a time, and under such circumstances a spirit of exclusion should be professed by the government, was a thing which raised in him the most ominous apprehensions of consequences that may follow. He would call on the noble Lords, he would call upon the country to support the present, to court at all times the cordial affection of Ireland. He would intreat them to remember that Ireland was loaded with a population which the population of this country could not employ in manufactures; and how disastrous the policy of chilling their disposition to enter the service of the army or navy.—From his soul he would speak in the face of the country, that the safety of the Empire, depended on the conciliation—it was by combining the heart and with that of England, that they could alone support up the great resources of the Empire, and defy any that was working for its ruin. After the speech he had heard that night, he was convinced that conciliation could never be effected without the aid of ministry; and if he had entertained any other opinion as to the propriety of this address, the speech of the noble Lord who had last spoken would have factually removed them.

GENERAL ADVERTISER.

LIMERICK—FRIDAY, MARCH 27, 1812.

London papers of Friday and Saturday last arrived in due course, but with the exception of the important proceedings in parliament, they are devoid of interest. The London prints of Sunday, which we received last night, announce the arrival of Major Forcelles of the Swedish Guards, which form Sweden to our government.—they are desired to relate not only to a direct and avowed connection with this country for the adjustment of all claims, but for pecuniary support in the event of war with France, and that anxious to obtain the sanction of Great Britain. Sweden has made such a demand not likely to be refused by our government. It is likewise said that the Major has been the bearer of dispatches, from the Russian capital. Paris is to the 13th inst. admit the fact of the military preparations of the French. We have received any further intelligence of the fate of the squadron from L'Orient.

Horsham, lying on the ground quite lifeless. Two pistols laid by the side of him, one of which was loaded, but the other had been discharged. On examining the body, a wound, by a pistol-ball, appeared below the right ear, which had evidently caused his death; and no doubt remains but that the horrid act was perpetrated by his own hand. A letter was found on the person of the deceased, in which he stated, that having outlived all his friends, life had become insupportable to him; and expressed a wish to be buried in his cloths. A one pound note, and some silver were also found in his pockets. The name of the unhappy man was Franklin. The Coroner's inquest returned a verdict of "felo de se" and the body has been buried in a cross road.

In answer to a question asked by the Earl of Lauderdale, it was on Thursday declared by Lord Bathurst, that no agreement whatever on the subject of commercial intercourse subsisted between this government and the government of France.

A troop of the German Legion embarked on Sunday at Cove, and will proceed for England the first fair wind.

His Majesty's sloop Trinculo, 18 guns, Captain A. Reany, expected every day in Cork, is appointed to take the fleet for the West Indies, under convoy. It is said they will not proceed on their destination until there are twenty sail. It is likewise mentioned they will not take their departure, until it is ascertained what course the French fleet has steered.

An account of the splendid "Fete Champetre," given by an Alderman of the Ballyntemple Corporation, shall appear in our next.
