

of the Count and Countess D'Antraigues, by their own servant.—The following additional circumstances of this horrible transaction we have since received;

The unfortunate Count survived only fifteen minutes after the poignard entered his body.

The Count D'Antraigues was a very eminent political character, formerly a Deputy of the Nobility of Vivarais to the States General, author of many eloquent tracts, and had married the celebrated Singer and Actress of the Royal Academy of Music at Paris, Madame St. Huberti:

Both the Count and Countess D'Antraigues were preparing to come to town, as they usually did every Wednesday. The Count had an appointment (as we understand) with his particular friend, Mr. Canning, to meet him at ten o'clock, and had actually taken his papers in his hat, and proceeded down the staircase from his bed-room, his lady, who went before, being at the door waiting, and calling for the servant to open the carriage. Lorenzo, at that moment, took from the bed of his master a pistol and a most superb Turkish poniard, which the Count D'Antraigues had brought with him from Constantinople. He discharged the pistol at his master at six paces distance on that staircase, and missed him, the ball passing between the Count and the Countess.

The murderer seeing the ball had not taken effect, took to the poniard, and stabbed his master in the shoulder. Though the blow was mortal, the Count had still strength enough to walk up to his room.—The servant then ran to the Countess, who was shrieking, and plunged in the most furious manner the poniard into her breast. She fell and died instantly, without any groans, saying only, Lorenzo, Lorenzo!

It appears that the Count died as soon as he had re-entered his room, from an effusion of the blood in his chest. The murderer, bewildered and frantic, after his ferocious deed, came to the where his master was lying, and seizing on another of the four pistols which the Count had constantly for his protection at his bedside with the poniard, discharged the contents in his mouth, and shattered his head in the most dreadful manner. He died on the spot, and fell by the side of his master. The alarm was given by the coachman, who was standing at the door, and the other servants. Two professional men came instantly, but no assistance could be had. The house was besmeared with blood, and presented a most shocking spectacle, the three corpses being extended in such a small space.

The Count had been formerly commissary of his most christian Majesty in Italy, and lately, and till his death, a secret agent and correspondent of the Emperor of Russia.

He eminently distinguished himself in the troubles which have convulsed Europe for the last two and twenty years. In 1789 he made himself conspicuous by his activity in favour of the revolution; but during the tyranny of Robespierre he emigrated to Germany, and was employed in the service of Russia. At Venice, in 1797, he was arrested by Bernadotte at the order of Bonaparte, who pretended to have discovered in his portfolio, all the particulars of the plot upon which the 18th of Fructidor was founded.

The Count made his escape from the Citadel of Milan after he was confined, and was afterwards employed in the diplomatic mission of Russia, at the Court of Dresden. In 1806 he was sent to England with credentials from the Emperor of Russia, who had granted him a pension, and placed great dependence upon his services. He brought letters of very warm recommendation from the Emperor to Lord Grenville; and afterwards paid his court successfully to ministers; for he received letters of denization, and very considerable sums were lavished by government, for services which he and his coadjutors undertook to manage.

The following circumstances, in so extraordinary a case, may be worth relating. The Count, it appears, always kept a brace of pistols hanging loaded in his bed-room, and a small dirk, under a presentiment that one day or another his life would be attempted. About a month ago the Countess and the servants heard the Count draw a pistol up stairs, and were in consequence great, alarmed; when one of the latter, a female, went up stairs, and looked into her master's room: it was full of smoke, and she screamed out; on its clearing away she saw Lorenzo standing, who told her nothing was the matter, he had only fired off one of his master's pistols. It afterwards appeared he had fired it into the wainscot; it was loaded with ball, and the bullet from the pistol is yet to be seen.

The verdicts of the Jury on the Coroner's Inquest into the bodies of the Count and Countess D'Antraigues was "Wilful Murder" against Lorenzo, their servant—

after searching the house for money, and breaking to pieces a valuable desk with a sledge, they decamped, after a delay of nearly two hours, with a booty of about thirty shillings.

An Inquest was held last week, by Daniel McNevin, Esq. at Loughrea, on the body of a soldier of the Royal Artillery, who it appeared had, in consequence of being refused by a young woman, to whom he paid his addresses, purchased an ounce of arsenic at an Apothecary's shop, under pretence of destroying rats, which he took on a tumbler of punch;—he died a few hours after taking the draught. A will was found after him wherein he bequeathed whatever property he had to the fair but cruel object of his affections. The lady, however, was justified in her determination, being informed by Captain Darby that the man had a wife and three children in Scotland. Much praise is due to this officer for his conduct on this and similar occasions.

Monday last, a horse, tacked to a car, got restive on the Bathing-house road, Galway, and notwithstanding the utmost exertions of his owner to prevent his flight, ran furiously, and the car coming in contact with a young woman, she was so dreadfully bruised, that little hopes are entertained of her recovery.
