ties of a populous town, and extensive Parish, his zeal tempered with christian meekness, was unremitting, the slender means he possessed, were often liberally applied to the relief of the necessitous, in him the indigent, had a feeling advocate, and vice was no less reproved by the precepts which he inculcated, than discountenanced by the force of his example; his Parishioners without distinction, whilst they have borne testimony to the excellence of his character, pathetically lament his loss, recommended to them by no connexion or previous acquaintance, his services in the cause of charity and advancement of moral improvement, of religious instruct on, and comfort frequently, “ Beside the bed, where parting life was laid,” raised him in their estimation far beyond the level of ordinary respect, to society the deprivation of such a man, must be regarded as a serious loss, and although endeared to his Relatives by ties of the warmest affection, it cannot fail to administer consolation, that his virtues are gone to receive the reward of imperishable happiness.
