

ents, two fowling-pieces were very valuable, and the apparel of every possible description—shirts, waistcoats—every thing more valuable could convey away. The amount cannot well be estimated at more than Fifty Pounds. But the villains were very offered no further manner of violence than what we have mentioned. On the drawers they very deliberately real Bank receipts of Mr. Prendergast's, the Government Debentures and Bank upon guess took some documents of stock. One of them who was left in the family below, while the ransack was being his taste for music, and trying a fiddle, on one of which he played a tune at all in the style of a vulgar musician, in preference to that which had four silver strings. Complaining of being fatigued at going to wish for some liquor, they, at the same time, desired the family not to be alarmed, and were satisfied with a glass of good whiskey. Three only of them were seized, and the others took not the slightest concealment.

The notoriety of Brennan's gang is pretty recent, and the names of those who are living who remember Freney's. This mode of robbery therefore, which is not unusual in all periods and districts, should not be mixed with any consideration of those atrocious or diabolical outrages that appear to be increasing. But the time and the manner of these robberies, the number of the banditti, and the discipline of the gang, ought to put every gentleman on the alert in pursuing every means for the prevention of the robbers, and in keeping a close watch on his protection—Clonmel Herald

It is very happy to hear that six of the persons who were taken out of the house of Mr. Prendergast were taken on Monday night, at Ardhanan, and the greatest part of the property was found in their possession—they were lodged in Clonmel jail on Sunday.

The case of a farmer in comfortable circumstances, who was with the dreadful murder of Mr. Long, of Clonmel, was lodged in Clonmel jail on Monday. The poor man was perished to death by sleeping in a bed near Marfield, Co. Tipperary, on the Wednesday last.
