dwelling house, which was a very excellent one, was burnt to ashes. The only assignable reason for this diabolical act (for Concoors and his family have been near half a century resident on the spot, and always an industrious, quiet people), is, that he had engaged in a job of work, which promised to bring him some profit, at a certain price, and, finding that some of his neighbours were trying to oust him of his bargain, by taking it at a lower rate, was determined on doing his business if he could, and succeeded in securing the work by still underbidding his competitors—and for his little rivalry, such is the disregard of human blood, that a whole family was doomed to be burnt alive, and escaped the horrid vengeance only by the effect of that cowardice, with which Providence paralyzes the hand of the murderer, at the terror of detection.
