are already apprised of the extent to which the inhabitants of Dublin have gone for the support of street begging. The Committee appointed to inquire into the subject, made their report on Thursday, and presented a melancholy spectacle of the length to which the system was carried. A plan has been proposed for the purpose, and resolutions were entered upon which will have the effect of providing for such of the beggars as are industriously inclined, and for the aged, infirm, and children; but as to the part of that class who are idle, and the nomination of sturdy vagrants, regulations should be made, in conjunction with the Lord Mayor and the Magistrates, for their total and effectual removal from the streets. As this work will be immediately commenced upon, it may not be considered superfluous to give a few hints on the subject.—

This class of worthless beings now are, the bane of the metropolis, where they have so long depended upon the spontaneous liberality of the rich and the alms-giver, it is natural to suppose, they will continue to establish themselves in those cities and towns, which bear resemblance to their late residence; and, if we may draw a conclusion, from the position, where benevolence is the characteristic of its inhabitants, and where charity has been so frequently and extensively administered to the wants of the poor, particularly in the last season of unexampled distress upon this head, we would suggest the necessity of immediate steps to prevent the ingress of these interlopers, who most undoubtedly have contributed to the present fatal diffusion of the plague throughout the country: it is therefore expedient, but indispensable to adopt such measures, as may through the influence of the law prevent the influx of these strangers. We trust, that every exertion possible has been made by our worthy Mayor to effect this object, but now that the general work of the year has begun, something more than their partial assistance must be effected. The inhabitants of Dublin must stimulate every town in Ireland, to be sensible that the state of mendicancy has reached to a degree alarming to society, and that in such circumstances a vigorous and united effort should be made to eradicate such an evil. The Government of Dublin must stimulate every town in Ireland, to be sensible that the state of mendicancy has reached to a degree alarming to society, and that in such circumstances a vigorous and united effort should be made to eradicate such an evil. The Government of Dublin must stimulate every town in Ireland, to be sensible that the state of mendicancy has reached to a degree alarming to society, and that in such circumstances a vigorous and united effort should be made to eradicate such an evil.

On Monday morning, between three and four o'clock, four fellows, with their faces disguised, entered the dwelling-house of John Reddan, Esq. in Wallis-street, by passing over the area, and entering into the kitchen, where they secured the man, whom they knocked down, and placed two ruffians over him as a guard, with a bayonet fixed to the others proceeded up stairs to the chamber where Mr. Reddan's father slept, which they entered and having presented a musket at him, demanded the key of the desk, out of which they delivered 106 Guineas in gold and bank notes, and also a few articles of wearing apparel, with which they decamped. One of the gang seemed dissatisfied at not getting more, saying that it was not worth the trouble of coming for such a trifle. He is at present in London, and we doubt
