

at Clonakilty, to serve upon his different debtors; the 5th he went to the house of the prisoner; he was at his house and seen there after nightfall, and never seen alive after that.—In the neighbourhood of Brien's house was the wake of one Cornelius Sweeney, and Sweeney's was a quarter of a mile from Brien's, and James Brien the elder was at Sweeney's wake during some part of the night. On deceased being buried, enquiries were made, and after a diligent search traces could be found of his body—though suspicion rested on the prisoner, it then became impossible to ascertain with certainty the agents in this foul transaction; and accordingly though the prisoners had been in custody on the charge, they were discharged at the following assizes, by proclamation, no bill of indictment having been found against them by the Grand Jury. Fortunately, however, for the administration of justice—fortunately for the laws of the land, and the peace of society, a discovery was made of the perpetrators of this murder. Two persons of the name of Coghlan (who were very young at the time, and appeared to have been seduced into this diabolical transaction by the elder James Brien), have lately been touched with compunction, and voluntarily came forward, and gave information of the entire transaction to Lord Carberry. By their testimony, it appeared that Maguire came to the house of the prisoner, on the night of Sweeney's wake; that he went to bed at 10 o'clock—that the Coghlan's were then sent for, and that when they came, they were placed in an out-house, all the victim was asleep, and until every body left the house—and then it appeared that James Brien, the elder, who came from the wake, with his wife and son, and the Coghlan's went into the room armed, with pickers, tongs, and other instruments of destruction, and with which they beat Maguire's head to pieces. The murder was consummated on that night—and the unfortunate man having been heard to moan, after they had returned from the scene of crime, one of the prisoners said he should moan no more, and he returned into the room, and with repeated blows finished the work of slaughter. They then carried the body away, and concealed it during the following day in a bog belonging to James Brien; but thinking the place insecure, they determined to remove it the following night, and to cut it into pieces to avoid detection. On the following night, they accordingly met, and with a hatchet severed the head from the body, and the legs from the thighs, buried the head and legs in one place, and the trunk in another.

This statement was clearly and satisfactorily proved, as also the finding of the head, limbs, and the trunk of the body, in the different places pointed out by the Coghlan's, and that the head had the marks of severe blows inflicted on it, and that the legs had been severed from the body. This atrocious murder, the most shocking and terrible that could be committed by human beings, was, after a lapse of more than seven years, brought to light by the interposition of that Almighty Providence who is the searcher of the hearts of men, in whose hands are the issue—the life and death of every human being.
