

the broad basis of Christian charity, from party was to be excluded, and in which they should be read without note or comment. If these Gentlemen were teased or tormented that this plan would not answer in each fear that they would give up this City, or Seminary some where else; and on this could propose that no further observations to the Executors.

could not agree with the learned Gentleman, that the Executors wished to do what was for the instruction to the poor of Limerick, and be assured by the present respectable Meeting of the Scriptures into their intended to preclude all Catholic children from its benefit, fact, he was persuaded they would give up assured the Gentleman who spoke last he Fitz-Gerald, that he was a man of clear much learning, and exemplary piety; he was an attachment to the principles of revealed was most zealous for the propagation of the such was his love, and such his conviction of reaped by the dissemination of this divine believed no power or influence on earth could yield a point of such vital importance to society and of pure religion. Doctor Fitz-Gerald, Roberts of Charleville, had prevailed on a subscriber to the Bible Society.

Maunsell said, that let his opinion be palatable always acted openly and candidly, and would be. He was sorry to be obliged to state, that at to the Executors appeared to him not candid reporting to be in behalf of the Free Schools of was, in reality, in behalf of Schools under the Catholicism of the Clerical Order. He liked the conduct, but he could not sanction a petition that a free School to which a Protestant could attend, without a certainty of his religious principles being observed. Far be it from him to wish to interman's conscience, but as a Pastor of the Protestant, he must declare against allowing that to be which was under the direction of persons bound principles of any of his flock who should go all the answer of the Executors with pleasure, their project most desirable, and very feasible, forbid that Protestants and Roman Catholics be and be educated under one roof. That it is possible, and I am firmly persuaded, that no means to wear down the asperities unfortunately seen both sects, and of amalgamating them, intercourse between the youth of each. The partial establishments at present existing, must increase the prejudice, and surely no system can tend more to accomplish this purpose than that holy word, to the reading of which God has social blessing. He saw no objection to it; support it, but he would not support a school of the Church of England.

He said he gave the Archdeacon every credit for and was sorry that the petition should appear and to shew with what a fair view it was could state, that before being forwarded it was signed Bishop of Limerick for his signature. This was signed.

Mr. Cull, P. P. said that he should be as candid as Archdeacon, and that he, a Clergyman of Catholic persuasion, had as much right to watch the interests of his flock, and must therefore object to their receiving instruction in a school where the Catholic, and where, therefore, the Protestant Dissension follow. He was persuaded, therefore, that the Executors would waive the point informed of the insuperable objection which Catholic Church had to its flock reading the proposed by the Executors.

Mr. Cull said, that he took the liberty of making suggestions. From what the Rev. Gentleman who had said, it appeared that the only objection which Catholic Clergy had to the proposed plan, was, that they should read the Bible—where there was so much candour and liberality of sentiment displayed, as at the present meeting, he thought this point on appeared a division, may be brought to meet the opinion of all parties—had the Roman Catholic objection to the Downy Bible being given, or committed into the hands of any of that
