

by which his scull was fractured this day to record another similar, barbarous one, upon a soldier of the corps. On Monday evening, a light o'clock, as James Ross was in Barracks, he was met on the road by, at the mere of the New County men, who passed him by—he had above a few yards, when they held of him—one of them knocked some heavy weapon—another drew out a large knife, with which he cut across the cheek and neck, took a large gaiter with the knife, and the in his pockets whatever money they saw several other blows, kicks, and drew the unfortunate man down into and rolled some heavy stones after him for dead. Fortunately the poor man in the fall, reach the deep water otherwise he would have been suffocated checked by a small mound of earth.

In this state he remained for some time though having lost a considerable quantity yet had sufficient strength to crawl on a road to the next house, and was conveyed on a door to the Hospital. Various and cruel outrages, committed on of the same corps, and in each within 100 yards of the Ordnance Barracks something more than the usual outrages by those nocturnal ruffians and one would suppose that the orderly conduct of those men which those men conduct themselves, the quality of their appearance both on and their total non-intercourse with the women would be a sufficient safe-guard from further outrages.

We trust no other stimulus will be necessary to induce our Peace Officers to make such nightly patrols as may bring those villains to that they so justly merit, than this consideration that the men are more prompt in affording aid and Power than the soldiers of the Royal Army and hence, perhaps, arises this deadly and conspicuous in the above acts.
