mply called King's Evil, and for her successful treatment of scorbatic and cutaneous diseases, has lately returned for her health to her place, Mount-Cross, near Mallow, in the County of Cork, after an extensive practice of the last twenty years in London and Bath, and leaving her daughter, Mrs. Davies, to attend to their eminent establishment, Alfred-place, Bedford-square, in the former city. When the subject of her remedy was introduced into Parliament, it was only, we believe, the distressed state of our Finances, prevented her obtaining a public reward for a discovery so important in lighten- ing the load of human affliction; for she prayed the most minute and strict investigation; and a little pamphlet of hers, which we have lately read, contains such a number of indisputably authenticated instances of complete recovery in the most inveterate and deplorable cases of the complaint, and after the Patients had been despaired of by several of the most eminent of the London faculty, that the efficacy of her remedy cannot be doubted. She has, we understand, resumed her practice in the spot where she discovered and first tried her invaluable medicine, and where we are informed the poor of the country around, congratulate themselves on having restored to them their kind and tender physician and general benefactress, for a space of upwards of thirty years previous to her settling in London.
