THE LATE REV. WILLIAM D. HOARE.

This good man and most exemplary Divine left his house, at Liford, near this city, on Thursday morning, for the purpose of proceeding to Shanagolden, on clerical business: he travelled in a gig, and was not, unfortunately, attended by a servant. About three or four miles from town, some accident happened which frightened the horse, and in his rapid course the vehicle was upset and broken, in which Mr. H. was found entangled. Careful dispatch was instantly used in conveying him to his residence, and, on the injury he had sustained being made known, all the faculty, with the most laudable anxiety for his safety, repaired to his house in order to administer every aid that professional science could supply for his relief and recovery. From the time he was discovered on the road after the accident he never spoke. When his medical friends reached him he was quite insensible. — No fracture, not even an external mark appeared on his person; but a copious discharge of blood issued from his ears, and a concussion of the brain, with the rupture of a blood-vessel, were apprehended to have been the sad consequences of the calamitous casualty. During the whole of Thursday night, Surgeons Thwaites and Gibson remained in attendance; and in the morning of yesterday the pulse of their lamented friend and patient having become slower and more regular, afforded some faint hopes to console the numerous sorrowing enquirers who surrounded the house and crowded the avenue. In the course of the day, however, these slight symptoms vanished; and, although Surgeons Thwaites, Gibson, Wilkinson, and Franklin, Doctors Harding, Campion and Lyons, and we might say almost every physician in our City, were incessant in their assiduities, yet all were unavailing, as he languished until seven o'clock this morning, when his valuable life ceased, and his pure spirit took its flight to those celestial realms prepared as the blessed reward for the piety and virtue which adorned and distinguished his earthly career.

To state that this much deplored Gentleman will be a great public loss, is no exaggeration. His demise must leave a blank among the benevolent characters of this City, which cannot be easily filled up. In whom shall the poor find so zealous a friend? Where will the destitute stranger discover so cheering and consoling a benefactor? What a privation, if not a calamity, will his absence be to all our charitable institutions, which were chiefly upheld by his unwearied exertions? His hallowed zeal in the cause of humanity originated several of our most useful asylums: the Widows' Alms-House, and St. George's Day School, and the Lying-in-Hospital are monuments of his piety and philanthropy. — To his indefatigable efforts and his animating example is the existence of the Mendicity Association attributable. As a Minister of the Gospel he performed his holy functions with piety and punctuality; and all the practice of his life was in such strict accordance with his precept, that he never failed to attract to the church in which he officiated, a crowded and most respectable congregation. The evening before the accident which terminated his useful existence, was the last time he addressed his flock, by every one of whom he was loved and venerated—and it is rather remarkable that he then concluded his discourse by saying that, "perhaps before the setting of another sun the summons may issue 'for himself.'" Alas! he was too prophetic—his last words have been mournfully verified; and in him Charity has lost one of its most earnest supporters—while Religion has been deprived of one of its brightest ornaments.

Mr. Hoare's remains will be interred at the Cathedral, at 12 o'clock, on Wednesday next.

satisfied with this, they minutely searched every part of the house for arms, and on going away, said it was a mistake to suppose they were put down; for that they would be found worse (or more terrible) than ever. — They then proceeded to a farm belonging to Mr. O'Connor, of Cork, (the brother-in-law of Mr. Saunders) in order to promulgate Rockite law to two new tenants on these lands, named Green and Brosnan.— Green was not at home; but Brosnan they caught, flogged him soundly, swore him to quit the farm within a week, to send his flax to the late tenant, and not to presume to dig any of his potatoes—all this under pain of death.

A quantity of Slates, the property of Mr. Foot, of Two-pot House, County Cork, which were prepared for roofing the offices burnt by the insurgents last Spring, were maliciously broken and destroyed, a few nights since.

On Tuesday night last, a party of fellows, well armed with guns and mounted pikes, attacked the house of a respectable man named Connors, at Kilmaclearn Cross, in the Barony of Orerry and Kilmore; in the County of Cork, they beat the unfortunate man most cruelly, after which they left the house without assigning any reason for the commission of this daring outrage.

In consequence of an order from Government, the Police Magistrate of this County had four hundred and ninety-seven guns, which were taken up by the Police within the last year, sledged down at Rathkeale, on Wednesday, under his own inspection; they are to be converted into shoes for the Police horses.

Immediately after the conclusion of the Bandon Sessions on Saturday, Mr. Martley proceeded on his way to Dublin, for the purpose of procuring the opinion of his Majesty's Law Officers upon the legality of his decrees. The question turns upon the fact, that an Assistant-Barrister for the West Riding of the County, had no existence at the periods of the issuing and serving of the processes which originated the subsequent proceedings, and upon which his decrees were finally made.

Nearly 200 head of Bullocks, belonging to a Gentleman in the County Clare, passed through here this morning, for the Cork Market.

The Fair of Newport on Thursday, was a miserable example of the state of the County. Bullocks which would have fetched a few years since from 12 to 14 Guineas were sold for £6 10. There was a good supply of all kind of stock, and but few bought.
