and polite demeanor, engaged the affection and esteem of all who were acquainted with his short and spotless career. This melancholy addition to the suffering of an already afflicted and disconsolate family, can better be felt by sympathy's soul, than expressed by affliction's pen, and, only mitigated by the grateful recollection, that though young in years, he died with a firm confidence that he was about to change a mutable and transitory, for a blissful and eternal life.
