We have not with no foreigner, since De Loime, who has evinced so clear and perfect an acquaintance with our political institutions as De Stiel. He has truly delineated their peculiar and delicate features; has traced their connection, even to the minutest shades, with the substantial existence of Liberty, and has held them up with generous applause to the admiration, and (if possible) to the adoption of his countrymen. He proposes to extend his views, hereafter, to the opinions and habits of Englishmen, and we make no doubt that his observations will be marked by the same truth, candor, liberality and gentleman-like spirit which shine in every one of these papers.
