

THE NEW MAYOR.—I acknowledge the pride at being elected Mayor of this ancient respectable city; but I feel, if possible, equal pride and satisfaction at receiving the office from one whom I would lament if absent, but, from my feelings towards him, as he is present, it would be impudent to speak of. I do value the bright example he has left me. I shall endeavour to imitate, and if I fail it will not, as he himself said, be any fault of the heart, but must surely be attributed to the head.—(hear.)—I bring to your recollection his exertions to set a set of persons who prey like locusts on the poor man. I mean the regratters who sell the Provisions in our Markets, and prevent the Tradesman from receiving the just value of his hard-earned wages—(applause).—I declare eternal war against such—(cheers). There be any present, I advise them to quit calling, for I will feel it my duty to watch the dealings at the Markets, and see that Poor of the City receive full and fair value to the last farthing—(cheers.)—I shall do best to earn for myself, at the resignation of my office, the same feeling I now see evinced towards my worthy predecessor—(applause). The late Mayor was then handed by the ladies into a Chair, procured by them for the occasion, and, preceded by the different Guilds, Masters and Wardens dressed in their respective costumes, and the proper Officers, bearing their banners, each floating in the air, the entire moved along from the Court-house, accompanied by the Sheriffs and a number of gentlemen, with several thousands in their train, occasionally rending the air with complimentary greetings. The procession passed along through the public streets, giving the salutations of the inhabitants, which must have been truly gratifying to Mr. Watson's feelings. Indeed, we know not whether he should not have been proud of such marked attention paid him by his fellow citizens; and, as an honest and impartial magistrate, always ready of access to the humbler amongst them, disposed to hear their grievances, and conscientiously alive to their rights, during a period of three years—an interval sufficient to test his capability and to be 'the Father of the City'—having fully proved himself to be so, we should equally be surprised if he had not received a mark of their partiality and gratitude.—noticing these public demonstrations of private and public feeling, towards Mr. Watson, we cannot, in justice, withhold our approbation of the fair and honourable conduct of Messrs. Westropp and Collis, our late Sheriffs, in discharge of important duties of that office; of them, we have not heard even a solitary complaint—our humanity and consideration, we have heard many speak. Of the new Chief Magistrate, with whose intelligence and good dispositions, we have been long acquainted; and the present Sheriffs, while looking to the not be omitted, that Mrs. Forde's absence from the meeting was a subject of great regret, from whatever cause it might proceed; and, it is hoped, she will soon resume her place before an audience whom she has so often delighted.

This evening, Miss Stanfield takes her benefit in the new and beautiful Opera of Guy Mansering, and the popular afterpiece of the Forest of Bondi, or the Dog of Montargis. The entertainment is of a description to procure for this young Lady that patronage and support, which her merit so justly entitles her to expect.

Mrs. Browne has kindly consented to devote her vocal powers to the cause of Religion and Charity, at an Oratorio, on Sunday next, for the benefit of the New Franciscan Chapel. This benevolent act must add still further to the claims which Mrs. Browne has on the public, and the obligation will no doubt be returned by the crowded house which is expected to attend her benefit on to-morrow evening, when she will take her final leave of an audience whose amusement she has so highly contributed. The performance is the new and popular Opera of Love laughs at Locksmiths, with the very celebrated and attractive afterpiece of Don Giovanni.

VIATOR shall appear in our next.

THE HOUSE can accommodate a large Family, and a good Garden attached with Fruit Trees. As the navigation cannot be affected by wind or tide, it affords besides its own local advantage, all that of a situation in Limerick.
