

...evidence as he could furnish, to prosecute Mr. Sheil, and then to turn upon himself, and prosecute him for sedition by Mr. Sheil, because he could not find any fault with the publication of it. He called Mr. Plunkett an enemy; they know not but they could not be deceived again. In the room while Mr. O'Connell was reading the paper, Mr. Plunkett was suddenly sneered. For himself, he said, that Mr. Plunkett prosecuting him. The Right Hon. Gentleman thought it his duty to be ready to go before a Jury of twelve men that Jury might happen to differ from Mr. Plunkett. Mr. Sheil then entered into the circumstances attending the publication of the speech, the application to Mr. Staunton, Mr. Wall, &c. He considered this a common-sense and Mr. Staunton, that, on his part of the first speech, no proceedings were taken against him (Mr. Staunton). What, then, was it when they heard that, after all this prosecution was commenced against Mr. Plunkett, the publication of a second speech, which appeared in all the other Papers, and which was copied from a Newspaper which was published by the Government? He had no doubt that this prosecution came from Mr. Plunkett; that the Solicitor-General had done it, and he expressed a hope that Mr. Plunkett would have the manliness to remain for the prosecution on other terms. He then entered into a review of former speeches, which, he said, were worse than those he had delivered. He likewise read some of the pamphlet just published, the language of which was almost similar to what he had used? He said, should he be prosecuted. He paraded the following close of a strong paragraph on the political relations of England and Ireland, and Spring Rice's letter to Lord Liverpool. He said, "The steam-boats of America may yet change angry resistance, and the steam-boats of America may prove dangerous visitants upon the coast of any man—the Attorney-General, the most voracious Placeman, say, he (Mr. Plunkett) is not one half so vehemently as Mr. Rice. He is again, from the same, 'secure the peace, by doing her people justice. Yet, for reflection, and for repentance—when no man can work.'—(Cheers.)" He then moved on the notice he had given, for the repeal of this Bill. The Tenantry Bill were brought in at the same time, and supported by Mr. Plunkett; together through the Commons, and then to the House of Lords, through the aid of Mr. Plunkett. It was concluded by moving, that a petition of the Joint Tenantry Bill be prepared for presentation on Tuesday. The Bill was seconded by Mr. Conway, passed by a majority of 100. Mr. Plunkett, Esq. was then called to the Chair, and he read the Bill, the meeting adjourned. Mr. Plunkett, Esq. was then called to the Chair, and he read the Bill, the meeting adjourned.

...prosecuted, so ought Mr. Spring Rice to be. These gentlemen are alike and urged the same of earnestness. If Mr. Sheil be prosecuted—so is Mr Spring Rice.—Dublin

The Guard instantly unharnessed one of the horses, and rode on with the mail-bags to Town, where he delivered them in safety at the Post-Office, only thirty minutes beyond the usual time.

DISPENSARY.—There was a meeting yesterday of the Subscribers to this Institution, which renders such important services to the middling and lower classes of the Community, and generally to every rank of Society, by checking in its bud, the growth of disease and contagion. The inestimable value of such an Institution, may be referred from a simple fact, viz.—that from the 1st January, 1826, to the 1st January, 1827, no less than 14,386 external and 6,969 internal patients received medicine and professional advice gratis, making a total of 21,355 objects relieved within that period. Such a multitude of cases rapidly on the increase, must necessarily require no ordinary share of labor and attention from the experienced Superintendent of that Establishment.
