Near Reading, Berks, James Jackson, aged 87, and John Jackson, aged 93. These brothers were old bachelors and afforded a striking instance of the insufficiency of wealth to create happiness; although they had been blessed with riches from the age of twenty, they denied themselves the common necessities of life, and lived in the village fifty years, as poor men, often accepting charity from any one who passed. They never suffered a woman or man to come into the wretched room in which they lived. They were taken ill at the same time, languishing about three weeks, and died worth £150000!
