

the absentee landed proprietors to bear a portion of the burden. Employment for our industrious and laborious population was that which was necessary for the prosperity of Ireland, and he was that the present Administration would give it encouragement. As to the increased duty on Irish spirits, it could not be deprecated in a moral view. If it would have a prejudicial effect on agricultural interest, or in other words, on the rents of the landlords, he could assure his hearers that it would meet with opposition from the great landed proprietors of the Houses of Parliament, before it passed into a Law. As to the duty on tobacco grown in Ireland, the culture of which was said to be most profitable, it should be considered that there was a vast import duty on foreign tobacco, which might be considerably diminished by the domestic production of that article—that the consequent diminution of Revenue must be, by some means, provided for, and that care should be taken that the deficiency be supplied from some source where it would be more easily felt. With respect to the increase of duty on spirits, it affected the public press, the proprietors of which were a powerful and influential body, very well read and well informed, and with powerful means in their own hands of defending and protecting their own interests. As far as this increase of duty may affect that class of the community—the law solicitors, he thought that these learned and experienced gentlemen would be at a loss to find means of spreading the advertisement very largely and impartially on the public. As to our intended ship canal and the improvement of the harbour of Tralee, when that measure was proposed he was of opinion that the foundation of a canal to run lower down the Bay, and a rail-road from the present harbour, would be preferable to the project. He gave up his opinion in deference to the mercantile gentlemen of Tralee, and was substantially instrumental in obtaining the Act of Parliament carrying that measure into execution. Most of the benefits which such a measure hold forth to the town and neighbourhood, would be incalculable—like ours, so rich in produce, and so happily situated for trade. The Right Hon. Gentleman mentioned that the Marquis Wellesley had, during his administration, offered him (the Knight) a free gift of ten thousand pounds towards the improvement of the harbour of Tralee, provided the plan was approved by the Government engineer, and also laid before his Majesty for his approval. The Right Hon. Gentleman concluded his able and eloquent statement by reading an extract from the address published by the Roman Catholic Bishops of Ireland, on the passing of the Catholic Emancipation Bill, recommending and inculcating loyalty, and conciliation, among all classes of his Majesty's subjects, and breathing the pure spirit of christianity and brotherly affection, which was listened to with marked and profound attention. After the Right Hon. Gentleman had concluded his address, the mason named Kelly, from the Grand Jury of Kerry, said, "What did you say about the disaffection of Kerry immediately came forward, and he would always be ready to answer any question put to him by an individual, whether freeholder or not, as to the cause of the disaffection of the first noblemen in the county, and he would now distinctly say that he never asserted that disaffection did not exist in Ireland. Such an assertion was foolish, and a falsehood. On the contrary he was active in pointing out to his Majesty's ministers the distress under which Ireland was suffering; and he would recollect it having been reported in the public papers that the Chancellor of the Exchequer declared, in the House of Commons, that no Irish Representative would be so diligent or indefatigable in pointing out to the Government the distresses of Ireland, and the best means for their alleviation, than the Right Hon. the Earl of Kerry. (Cheers)

The Bill was then signed by the principal freeholders of the County of Kerry. The meeting was declared adjourned sine die, and the meeting separated in perfect order, harmony, and unanimity.
