firmness, and abilities, he had no doubt he would be guilty of those deeds of O'Gorman Mahon—yet, Rev. Friend, he will permit Mr. O'Connell to do as he pleases for himself. For this purpose we were letter written by the Liberator to to an invitation from the Reform public dinner, to celebrate their the heroic achievements of the 'nicknamed' glorious three.

"I am proud to receive an invitation to a dinner, and would certainly do so, but at a distance of many hundred miles, only by sympathy with the honest and I make no doubt, will crowd that I firmly to assert that there will not be strongly admires, or would be more a serious example of the French people—they are an honest people, and use of their Elective Franchise?"

Mr. O'Connell adds, in the same breath, "I will cheerfully contribute to the cause allude to?"

This subscription was to relieve the widows, and orphans of those citizens who died for liberty.

Hear this, you ten pound Freeholders are too quick not to draw your own conclusions, have O'Connell and our Rev. Friend, and are pitted against each other. I am in his accusation against O'Gorman Mahon, O'Connell to the winds. Yet, notwithstanding of Mr. O'Connell's impiety staring in the face, for his memory is not a shield, this occasional letter, a great and stern honesty of purpose; no doubt as described by our Rev. Friend, ergo, he is not an admirer of infidelity, the right hand of fellowship to Jacobinism, you must equally acquit O'Gorman Mahon, merits of the French Revolution, upon minor points, we would wish to see the French question O'Connell and O'Connell's opinion. The atrocities alluded to which stained the first Revolution, were condoned by every friend to good morals, the Clergy of France imitated the conduct of the Catholic Priesthood within the discharge of their spirit, had been restrained by the grave and had been given at the last General Assembly, and enlightened Catholic Hierarchy, to avoid the stormy path of infidelity, science was relieved by the passing of such a course been adopted in France, not have to record the dread reactions of that country were inhumanly visited upon that day.

Our Rev. Friend may, no doubt, mention the Electors, if an enemy to himself upon them, but, having O'Gorman Mahon in harness on the side of our Rev. Friend adduces again to the latter gentleman, conclude by saying, in the best possible manner, our Rev. Friend that he has stepped into a beam in the political eye of O'Gorman Mahon, in which the worthy and excellent not discover a mote.

Ten Pound Freeholders of Clare, notwithstanding the long shot fired by our man who fought your battles in the name of your franchise unawed or uneducated, however artfully flung at you, will persuade you from remembering

O'GORMAN MAHON
