

solved, and that the population... policy of yielding to the ordinary authority of the laws. He would advise them to reflect on the enormity of the crime they had committed, and he trusted that the bountiful mercy of his Majesty would prepare them to atone in time for that tribunal which was yet to pronounce on their guilt. His Lordship then sentenced them to execution on the 6th of April instant, but he said it would be respited.

George Meade was indicted for the murder of Serjeant James Robinson, 5th Regiment, at Cloudegad, then withdrew his plea of not guilty, and pleaded guilty.

Mr. Bennett said he felt justified in acceding to the proposition. Two examples have been already made for this crime, a great number were concerned in the murder, and he believed the prisoner was one who unguardedly joined an unlawful confederation. He hoped the prisoner would feel a proper and sincere contrition for this clemency. He understood the prisoner was not a promoter or inciter to the attack, and he would intercede with the Lord Lieutenant for a pardon to save his life, but which must of course involve any commutation of sentence Government may think advisable.

Judge Moore said the withdrawal of the prisoner's plea was a proof of submission to the law, and admission of his guilt. He expected it would make a salutary impression on his confederates. His Lordship pronounced sentence of death for the 6th of April, which he said would be also respited by authority of the Court.

Judge Jebb now withdrew to preside in the other Court.
