

express no doubts on the subject of your Correspondent's "respectability," if I were not induced to venture on (perhaps) such dangerous ground, by my firm conviction that a strict adherence to truth, and a total absence of anything having even the appearance of a disposition to suppress it, are the best recommendations that any statement can possess, and the surest tests by which to judge of the writer's respectability; and finding the "account" of the Cullen Meeting most mischievously defective in both particulars, you will readily understand why, in acknowledging its author's claims to be considered respectable, I should experience some strong and almost irresistible misgivings.

In the first place, it is stated that "on the troops arriving at Cullen, the Meeting was proceeding." I don't exactly understand this language, but if it mean that the business of the Meeting, was not over, and that all the resolutions published in your paper were not carried, when Mr. Wilcocks arrived—It is a gross perversion of the fact. The Meeting was over at the time, and the "leaders" as they are called, were proceeding to leave the Platform, when the Dragoons were seen approaching at a rapid pace—Mr. Wilcocks having heard outside the village, that he was too late; a great disappointment to be sure, after all his three days previous fuss. As the troops drew nearer, I considered it to be my duty, to exert all the influence I possessed in preserving order, and this feeling occasioned the harangue, or indeed, more truly earnest, and anxious exhortation which I offered to the people, assuring them that they had nothing to fear from the soldiers, who, I said, would never fire upon them while they acted peaceably and as they ought. Thank God! the people took my advice, and they will not require the assistance of your correspondent's very accurate description of my person and dress, to discover where I may be found, when the cause of justice and of truth will again require to be fearlessly, but constitutionally, asserted.

Mr. Wilcocks interrupted me by roaring out the word "disperse" before he read any Act, or went through any form whatever; and if I were to conclude from his tone and manner, I would say that the proceeding contained more a declaration of war, than it exhibited any thing like a disposition to preserve the peace, when he found that the people were still quiet, and that the "Lawyers" were peaceably disposed to obey his mandate, no matter how insulting the manner in which it was given. He had recourse to other means of discovering his great loyalty and attachment to the place; and changing his mind he arrested all on the Platform, and had it instantly surrounded by Dragoons. I would attempt to give the most distant idea of the bitter disappointment which his countenance exhibited when the second effort proved as fruitless as the 1st. At this period Major Rose did not as mentioned, "haul down" the flag, for this reason that it was never above, (because I believe the gallant Officer quite capable of so mighty an achievement,) he merely received it from a countryman, whose countenance at the moment when he was standing under the Platform, by no means indicated a disposition to dispute the wishes of the distinguished Major; and I must say as a sufferer myself, that he only claim to a Medal for his services upon that day, which the Major can have, is entirely founded on the zeal and activity with which he got his men to destroy some valuable pasture in the neighbourhood of Cullen. It is not true that the people were "flocking in from every direction" to the neighbouring parishes, to be sure, sent their congregated thousands to join our meeting, but they were met on every side, by persons whom I sent from Cullen to announce that the meeting was over, and to state the reason why we did not wait for our friends. The really brave and disappointed men at once faced to their homes, and by so doing, while delighting their friends, they gave strength and efficacy to the quiet and constitutional, and, I will add, great Anti-tithe Meeting at Cullen. I could not help smiling at the tone of exultation with which your correspondent states that nine hundred men, with three pieces of artillery, deprived the women and children of Cullen of their very tasteful decorations, and can only say, that if Cullen "at one time" had the appearance of a "wood" the soldiers and police were not unlike its savages. The village, to a very late hour, was crowded to excess, and at a single disorderly or drunken person was to be found.—I will not do you the injustice to suppose, Sir, that an apology is required, when, in mentioning all these facts which I can have proved, I only afford you an opportunity which I am sure you are glad to seize on of advancing truth, and refuting misrepresentation, and am Sir,

Your obedient Servant,

JOHN KEATINGE O'DWYER.

Bruff, July 20th, 1832.

Sir,—Your Paper of the 18th inst. is now before me, in which a paragraph, containing a very exaggerated, (and in many respects, a false report) of the anti-tithe meeting held in this town, on Monday last, appears.

Your informant, whoever he may be, most certainly misrepresented the matter, and I fear intentionally led you astray. Nothing but an incurable disposition to malign the people and their priests, would have induced him to so exaggerate and suppress the truth. It is utterly false, that the Roman Catholic Clergy conducted their respective flocks with banners, flags, and music, to the meeting. Amongst the countless

TIPPERARY ENDOWED SCHOOL.

THE business of the School will be resumed on Monday, the 23d Instant.

An early attendance of the Pupils is particularly requested, as Professor Spalding has been engaged to give lectures on Elocution, System of Attitude and Gesture, &c., early in August, the great advantages of which have been fully developed at the examinations in June, and highly appreciated by a crowded audience, composed of the rank and fashion of the surrounding neighbourhood.

The house is beautifully situated, and decidedly one of the finest establishments in Ireland, thirteen thousand pounds having been expended on it about twelve or thirteen years ago. It is quite detached from the town, and stands aloof from every species of nuisance, and the play-grounds are very extensive and dry.

No expence has been spared in procuring Assistants of the highest character in every department: there is little or no corporal punishment, except in cases of absolute necessity. The Pupils are treated like gentlemen, and trained up with gentlemanly feelings, and nothing omitted that may tend to increase their comfort.

FEDAMORE ANTI-TITHE RESOLUTIONS,

July 3, 1832.

MY LORD,

IN compliance with the desire of a peaceable and respectable Anti-Tithe Meeting, of about Twenty Thousand Persons legally convened at Fedamore, in this County, on the first instant. I have (as presiding on that occasion) the honor of enclosing a vote of thanks for your unanswerable Letter to Mr. Stauley, on the Report of the Select Committee on Irish Tithes.

Give me leave, my Lord, to add the humble expression of my own gratitude for your countless services in the cause of a suffering people—as also for the Letter to which I have alluded above—It proves that the path of truth and justice is the safest in public as in private life, and that the darkest mists of falsehood, suddenly disappear before the chaste-light of profound genius and of moral worth.

I have the honor to be, my Lord,

Your obedient humble servant,

RICHARD O'SHAUGHNESSY.

Right Rev. Doctor Doyle, R. C. B. Carlow.

Carlow, July 14, 1832.

DEAR SIR,—On my arrival here yesterday after an absence of several days, I was honoured with your letter of the third of July, enclosing a vote of thanks to me by the Anti-Tithe Meeting at Fedamore, in the County of Limerick, at which you presided, on account of my late Letter to Mr. Stauley on the Report of the Select Committee of the House of Commons on Irish Tithe.

I am exceedingly happy in acknowledging the kindness done to me by that large and peaceable meeting, and by yourself in conveying to me, in so flattering a manner, the expression of their good opinion.

The advocacy of truth will always excite hostility, and he who enforces justice will ever have to combat against the powers of this world. I have, through life, regardless of
