

THE LATE DR. CHARLES KEANE.

It is indeed with unaffected sorrow and regret for his loss, we mention the demise of the very estimable young Gentleman whose name we have placed at the head of this article. But a few weeks since we hailed his arrival amongst us, with something of pride as well as pleasure. We saw him in the full bloom of youthful strength, commencing his career in life in a profession with every prospect of success seeming to await him. Possessing as he did a cultivated mind, with abilities of the highest order, if Providence had allowed to him length of days, he would have reached to eminence in his profession. But the fiat had gone forth, and the same Almighty Being, who says to the raging sea, "be still," issued his mandate of recal, and his mortal remains are now placed in the receptacle for all living. Deeply indeed we do, in common with every resident in the town, deplore his premature dissolution. Every one without distinction esteemed him while living, and the same general sympathy followed his remains to the grave-yard, at Kilmaley, on Friday morning. This general expression of regret may be said to be a poor offering of consolation to his afflicted young wife and family,—yet it must be a consolation, however, to them, that his career, though a short one, bore promise of future fame, and that while he was suffered to remain as a candidate for public favor, he earned in a few months what others have for years toiled in vain for. To his attendance in the cholera hospitals, and here subsequently, we may attribute his death.—Clare Journal.

A few days since two fellows, one of them armed with a pistol, and the other with a blunderbuss, forced an entrance into the house of a farmer near Mitchelstown; after the farmer was put on his knees one of the villains missed fire at him with the pistol; the farmer instantly sprung up, and seized the fellow, between whom and the farmer a severe struggle ensued; the farmer's wife now assisted her husband; this occurred in the bed-room, while the fellow armed with the blunderbuss remained in the kitchen; but hearing the noise he proceeded to the room, and just as he was entering a labourer, who was hid in the kitchen, seized a slane, and with a blow severely cut the fellow in the back of the head; the fellow armed with the pistol effected his escape, but the ruffian cut with the slane was secured; he has proved to be one of the murderers of the late Rev. Mr. Whitty.

On Wednesday last, the Proctor of the Rev. Mr. Grant, who had been engaged in valuing in the neighbourhood of Fernoy, was seized by an immense concourse of women, who placed him on his knees, and were about cutting off his ears with sickles, when some humane persons interfered, and dissuaded them from such a brutal act. The Rev. William Butler, Rector of Ballyhooly, sent his Proctor, who was protected by twelve policemen, on a similar duty; but in a short time several thousand of the misguided peasantry assembled—and the police and the proctor had to return, not, however, before the latter was sworn never again to value title!
