THE ABBOTSFORD SUBSCRIPTION—The support given by the late Sir WALTER SCOTT, in 1826, to his booksellers, involved him in the ruin which fell upon their establishment, to an extent alike unexpected and unprepared for, but which ultimately proved not less than £120,000.— Ruinous as this demand must have been, it is yet obvious, that after surrendering to its payment the whole of his property, he might have secured to himself and his family the fruit of his subsequent exertions, and realised from his latter works not less than £70,000. The whole of this sum, with whatever more a lengthened life might have enabled him to obtain, he, with many and conscientious feeling appropriated to the benefit of his creditors. In thus devoting his talents to the acquittal of obligations not originally, though legally his own, he laboured with a degree of assiduity, and an intenseness of anxiety, which shortened his existence by over-strained intellectual exertion. He lived not indeed to complete the task; but what he had secured, when added to the property and copyrights previously destined for the support of his family, enabled them, by incurring deep personal responsibility, to satisfy nearly the whole amount of these debts, for which their father had been rendered liable. This has been done, and the sacrifice is complete, but Abbotsford can no longer be the home of his children. Such were the stainless and irreproachable principles of that mind, whose intellectual power was only equalled by its moral worth; and from this plain statement, those who have long and justly appreciated the writings of SCOTT, may learn to love and venerate his virtues. It is thought that no memorial can be appropriate to his name, as the permanent maintenance of the house which his residence has rendered classical, and the preservation of a library and collection of national antiquities, which his admirable taste selected, and which his genius made available to works, that are in every hand, and have carried the glory of English literature through every civilised region to expect. It is then too much to expect, from a nation so justly proud of his fame, that in requital for so many hours of pleasure derived from his writings, they will be eager to subscribe to a tribute of gratitude alike honourable to the giver and the receiver; to show, that in a country like this, literature has also her triumphs, and genius its Blehmens, bestowed by a great and cultivated people on the children of him whose life was shortened by his integrity, and whose name is immortalised by his works?
