A BELIEF in the existence of the fountain of youth from which those who bathed in its waters gain pristine energy, was among the speculations of the century; it will, however, serve as no inapt type of the viving powers of art and medicine. Those who, early in life, to a morbid imagination, have sought fatally to au-spicate the purposes of nature, and have consequently laboured into a state which brings with it weakened capabilities, clouded hopes, may, by timely application to professional treatment, regain the first, noblest, and best of powers “guilty solitude,” the progress of which is marked by “lymphatica somnia” of Pliny, attended with bodily weakness and mental apathy. We may indulge a natural curiosity in referring to our daily correspondence with great and convalescent patients, not confined to our own country but diffused over the whole world. For twenty-five years has our peculiar treatment in cases of Nervous Debility proved eminently successful, and we have hitherto received the earnest solicitations of our patients to publish their
