

would be placed in a time of peace.— makes them very safe generally being, like the Turks, a paragraph has been stating that this is in Ireland, and keeps a little inn in the staken, a Morning reasoning on Sars- which was in part fortunately for the is not good. We authority, and by at he was born in officer, an Irishman ng in the island.— which first published the brother who nently invited to vitation from af- ublish the letter.

nd Rothschild.— udes of fate! Do s the Boulevards, d'Artois, but now Laffitte; there, a e best and most re), there you will rtar, pyramids of ernalia of Hiram- sounds of many uments, used in there you will see s, and supervising , from "morn till se a little. Two ous mansions, are illeurs, but under ery different pur- is the European, use of the great, That in struc-

THE LATE BISHOP OF LIMERICK.

Dr. Jebb was an author of some fame in the religious world; his latest work was devoted to the publication of the Remains of an ornament to the Irish Church, too early lost to it—the late Doctor Phelan, of Trinity College. In the last number of the Dublin University Magazine—a work to which, if we are told rightly, the Prelate was a contributor—we find the following account of Dr. Jebb's literary occupations in his latter years. It is now doubly interesting when the subject is removed from us:—

It is now some years since Dr. Jebb was severely attacked by paralysis while engaged in the discharge of his episcopal duties. The attack was so sudden and so violent that little hopes were for some time entertained of his recovery; but by the very skilful aid which was promptly afforded, life was preserved, and his medical advisers enjoined his removal to another country, as a means not only of bringing him within reach of the ablest of the faculty, but also for the purpose of withdrawing him from the immediate pressure of those professional anxieties, to which, no doubt, his attack was in some measure to be ascribed.— He was accordingly conveyed to the neighbourhood of London, and very soon began to experience the benefit of the change. His general health gradually improved, and he again felt himself equal, if not to professional at least to literary exertion. This ("The Life and remains of Dr. Phelan") is not the first time that his labours as an editor have been before the public; but when his edition of "Townson's Discourses" appeared, although we were fully aware of the more than merely editorial obligations which we owed him as the collector as well as publisher of those beautiful sermons, we were not aware that this was done by one who continued, notwithstanding the improvement in his health, to be deprived of the use of his right side, and who was obliged therefore to write all his manuscripts with his left hand.

LAW POINTS.

Highly important to Purchasers—Searches after Judgment within Twenty years before Mr. Moore's Redocketting Act.

Question—I read in Stewart's Despatch an