lordship that Protestant Clergymen have not been murdered or brutally assaulted in Ireland! Dr. Kinsella says he heard of but one Protestant Clergyman being murdered, and never heard of brutal assaults. He concludes with an assertion that no Priest ever denounced a Protestant Clergyman.

CORONER'S INQUESTS.—An inquisition was taken before Thomas Whitesone, Esq. Coroner, and a jury of very respectable gentlemen, at Broadford, on New Year's day, on view of the skeleton of a man named Patrick Barry, who was buried alive about thirteen months since! The circumstances attending this appalling transaction are nearly as follow:—The deceased had been a millwright for some time in the employment of a man of the name of David Burns, near Broadford: he was old and in a very delicate state of health, and being no longer able to work at his trade, Burns sent him on a car to some friends of his residing in the county Tipperary, with one of his sons and the informer, who had also been in his service. On their arriving they were refused admittance at two houses and were obliged to return back: on returning they communicated the circumstance to old Burns, who asked them why they did not put him into a hole and throw a ditch on him, and immediately ordered another of his sons to go and make a grave in a small burial place convenient to the house, which he did, and then the younger son and the informer brought him there, having previously taken off part of his clothes; they then thrust him into the hole, and when covering him with earth, it is alleged, he groaned twice and stirred one of his arms, upon observing which the informer called and said they would all be hanged, that the man was alive! This, however, did not prevent them from pursuing their inhuman work, and the unfortunate man was covered in.—Previous to the discovery of the body, which had on it at the time some portion of decayed garments; the informer described the place where it was interred, and most accurately the position in which the body was found; the head raised, the body inclining to the right side, and one leg also raised as if indicating an effort to rescue himself, or of great suffering when they were throwing the earth upon him. It is a remarkable circumstance that over the body a child's coffin was found, of which the informer denies all knowledge. The Jury came to the decision, 'That the deceased was buried alive by James Burns, Michael Burns, and John Connellan, and with the concurrence and knowledge of David Burns the father, all of whom have been committed.

An inquisition was taken by the same Coroner at O'Gonnelloe, on view of the body of a man named Daniel Rogers, who was supposed to have been poisoned, and who had been interred for some days. It being necessary to analyse the contents of the stomach, Dr. Sampson brought them to Ennis for that purpose. Until the result is ascertained no verdict can be found, and the inquest was adjourned to Monday next.—Clare Journal.
