 Last night, in Catherine-street, John Eyres, Esq. A.M. Student of the Middle Temple, London, and one of the resident Masters in the Dublin University. The announcement of this young gentleman's sudden removal from this vale of uncertainty and sorrow, is but a record of the loss of whatever mankind regard with veneration. His natural abilities and studious habits facilitated an acquirement of classical and mathematical science, which seldom rewards even such industry as his. He drew on his mental resources for those large acquirements of literary fame, by which both at School and in College he became so eminently, so deservedly, and therefore so unenviedly distinguished. But, his character was as pre-eminently developed, as it will be permanently recorded, in the short and comprehensive epithet—a good son! Supported in the short but fatal progress of inflammation by the consolations of true and undefiled religion, he, with a composure of soul worthy of its source, endured those pangs of nature which hastened his entrance into "eternal life."
