John Tyrrell Baylee's School
 4, BAKER-PLACE, PERY-SQUARE.

Terms, &c. presented in Cards. No Winter Vacation.
 IN consequence of dishonourable conduct recently directed towards his School, J. T. BAYLEE is induced to state that he has never, directly, nor indirectly, solicited a pupil, and he trusts his conduct evinces grateful feeling for the friends he has long enjoyed.

J. T. BAYLEE gives no public Examinations, and Displays which—"Play round the head, but come not near the heart."

In thus noticing Public School Examinations, I have the most distant intention of reflecting censure on those who give, nor on those who encourage them; I only assume the same right of judgment in rejecting, that they do in choosing them; and I also exercise the same right with respect to pompous denominations, and the Specious, but ill-founded systems, under which Schools are sometimes announced. If, indeed, I could expect any advance in mental cultivation beyond the ordinary range, from the application of these Systems, it would be a duty to pursue them; but a mature examination of the best amongst them, and a long many years attentive observation, facts support me in saying—"They lead, to bewilder; and dazzle, to blind; and what other result can be expected from those systems, which they are always equally, and sometimes more difficult to elucidate; so, it may truly be said, those Systems live by Suicide, and when suffered to exist."

Doctor Pemberton in his sketch of Sir Isaac Newton says: "In contemplating his genius, it presently becomes a doubt, which of these endowments had the greatest share, sagacity, penetration, strength, or diligence; and, after the mark that seems most to distinguish it is, that which himself made the justest estimation of it, declaring, if he had done the world any service, it was due to none but industry and patient thought; that, he kept the subject of consideration constantly before him, and waited till the first dawning opened gradually, by little and little, till it was full and clear light."

And, in the Preface to a work recently published (which is second to none on the same subject) the Translator says: "In addition to the aids to the mind already enumerated, various others will, in casting over a work of this nature, readily present themselves. I shall not fail to remark, for example, the ease with which may combine in the memory the Destruction of the Spanish Armada in 1588, and another great event similar in principle (that is, tending equally to the downfall of Catholic domination)
