

As it is conjectured that, no matter their adherence and attachment to office, should the Whig Ministry be defeated on the motion that the Speaker leave the chair—Lord Melbourne will resign or dissolve. It would be preposterous to suppose that he will longer resist the voice of the Nation, so forcibly expressed by majorities of the House.

"I have just heard that the Pro-Collector of Cork, who was selected to inquire into the defalcations at Galway, has been appointed to the Collectorship of Carlisle, in the North of England. This was a well-deserved distinction to one of the ablest officers in her Majesty's service, and so the Commissioners of Customs considered when they selected him for so important a collection.

are in poor circumstances; these feel peculiarly the benefits of this Institution. They see the happy fruits of its labours in the welfare and comfort of the children located amongst them. They contribute beyond their power to it as a Benevolent Assurance Society, which secures maintenance and protection for their own and brethren's orphans and widows, and the knowledge of its flourishing condition has called forth many an aspiration and expression of gratitude to God, who thus encourages them to honest industry, and nerves their arm to labor when distress or weakness would unman them. They feel too a deeper attachment to home where such security against want is provided, and they manifested those feelings on this occasion, by the deep attention, the warm response, and the comparatively very large sum subscribed at the termination of the proceedings. It is much to be hoped, that those facts and considerations will dispose their wealthy brethren so to swell the funds of the Society, as to enable the Committee to entertain favorably the new cases of orphanage related at the meeting of this most interesting branch of the institution.

DEATHS.

Of typhus fever, Thursday night, at the North Monastery, Cork, Gerald Griffin, Esq. late of this City, author of "The Collegians," "Tales of the Munster Festivals," and other works of high literary merit. The fame of this respected gentleman will descend to posterity. Few, or perhaps none of his contemporaries could excel him in the peculiar beauty and chaste style of composition for which his works are celebrated. Morality, religion, and patriotism, each "the purest and brightest," animated the writer, and shone with happy lustre through every page of his productions. Nature and truth were characteristic features of those affecting scenes, which as novelist, poet, or dramatist, he sketched with a felicity of imagination and elegance of diction rarely to be found in modern authors. But in the meridian of fame, when Fortune smiled upon him, and every circle hailed the son of genius, he abruptly quitted the walks of literature, and religious retirement devoted his whole mind to the contemplation of the Creator and his blessed works. Admiring friends and countrymen deplored the loss, but he preferred God's worldly honour and temporal riches. His life was that of a good Christian—the end, the death of the righteous.

On the 13th inst. at Abington House, in this county, Margaret, widow of the late Jeremiah Ryan, Esq.—a lady of the most amiable qualities, and sincerely and deservedly regretted by her family and friends.

This morning, on the North Strand, of decline, Charles Hanrahan, Esq.; regretted by a numerous circle of friends and acquaintances.

At Macroom Castle, county Cork, on the evening of the 8th inst. Robert Hedges Eyre, Esq. The name, station, and character of this distinguished gentleman require no eulogy from the Press. A correspondent writes—"As a friend, he was warm and sincere; as a landlord, kind and indulgent; as a magistrate, just and impartial; as a politician, consistent and undisguised. In his charities he was as boundless as unostentatious; in his manners he was as kind as he was courteous, as generous as he was hospitable. Ever actuated by the ruling principle of his life, he conferred benefits on all around him without permitting the objects of them to know the source from whence they flowed. 'He was, but words are wanting to say what—say all that's great and good, and he was that.'"

At Coalville, Tipperary, William, only son of Wm. Harvey, Esq. Mr. George Grace, of Thurles.

At Dunganrao, Richard, son of the late Richard Barron, Esq. of Durrow.

Hannah, wife of George Goold, Esq. of Aughrim, daughter of Jeremiah Maetic, Esq. of Woodview, county Cork, and niece of Daniel O'Connell, Esq. M.P.
