COUNTY COURT-FRIDAY.

At half-past nine o'clock Henry Kemmis, Esq. Q,C. acting Judge, took his seat on the Bench, when the prisoners charged with the Adare conspiracy were placed at the bar. The long panel was then called over, and 106 jurors answered to their names. After a few challenges the following jury were sworn:

Thomas Looney were indicted for feloniously and malicisetting fire to the out-offices of the Earl of Dunraven, at Adare, on the 18th of April last. indictment contained four counts, in each of which

Looney was charged with inciting the other prisoners

Mr. Bennett, Q.C. stated the case. He said-Gentlemen oi the Jury, the case I am about to lay before you is one of some importance, and one, which I am happy to say, of singularity, for I never had to deal with the like of it during my experience at the bar, nor I believe you never had to try a similar one as jurors. There are four prisoners in the dock, three of are indicted for actually setting fire to the out-houses of Lord Dunraven, and burning the corn contained in a barn.—Looney is charged, not with doing it himself, but as being an accessary before the fact. One of the prisoners, Mary Regan, a young woman, may get off, if the Jury conceive she acted under the coercion of her husband, for although she stands charged with a felony, she is excusable by law if at the time of committing the deed she acted under his orders; but on the other hand, if she participated in it during his abence, she is equally as guilty as her husband. How-ever, this is a question of law, and will be expounded by his Lordship. The singularity of the case is that the four prisoners were Crown witnesses on former occa-sions, and having tasted and partaken of the benefits derivable to such a class of persons, they actually planned this, (and I dare say other conspiracies of dangerous nature) more for the purpose of again getting into the pay of the Government than from any malicious motives towards the Nobleman whose property was consumed. In such a case as this it is the incumany object in view but to give his evidence fairly and conscientiously—if it was thought he was actuated by duty of the Crown not to allow a witness to forward in any case through bias, or who has t Pery-square. At any other motive he would never be put ing in, and promise ward, and if, afterwards it was ascertained ward, and if, afterwards it was ascertained that a witness acted unfairly, it was the peculiar duty of the Government to punish him to the fullest extent. In this instance it is their determination to do so. James Regan was a principal witness in prosecuting a party for taking fire arms; he was consequently in the pay of the Government, but he got all the money he was entitled to. Mary Regan, his wife, a very young woman was also a crown witness, in charging a person with rape at a period when she was younger than at present; but that person was not brought totrial. Mary Burns was a witness against persons who robbed Mr. Stafford O'Brien -she was the only evidence that could be adduced, the case was not brought forward, and she was also paid off. Looney, the instigator of the present transaction, was a witness against two men tried for the murder of Mr. Shine, and he was nearly paid off. Having ceased to be receiving money, they could not taste the sweets of the guard the night complainant was struck, he let him and agreeing to charge no less than six persons as being the perpetrators of it. Looney asks how he is to identify these persons, and Ryan says he will give him a description of four of them, conceiving that by only swearing positively against that number, it would show their accuracy. We will prove how they broke the Church windows, and that something was said about a new—we will give evidence of Looney's saying hethought it a pity to burn the horses in the stable-of the agreement to give information to the police, of Mary Burns informing Regan of Looney's intention not to go with him to —of Regan's telling her he would take herself, for "she was a good sound witness," and other matters of importance. I have now stated how the conspiracy was concocted, and will briefly mention the means resorted to in order to carry their designs into execution. After the burning Mary Regan went to the police office, and told one of the party that she saw four of the men that set fire to the stables coming out over the demesne wall, and that her husband was gone in pursuit of them. Next morning Constable M'Connell went to the house where Regan, his wife, and Mary Burns were; he found the three of them in one bed, undressed, and Regan told him of his pursuing the men, and actually named some of them—Patt Molony, John Flanagan, John Breen, and two others of the name of Nash and Cosgrave. He said he saw Breen go round his own with a short gun in his hand, which he hid behind, and said if the policeman went there he would find it, which he did, and got it. This would be proved to be the very blunderbuss purchased in Limerick by Regan, and the men he named as being in company with Breen, and having set fire to the stables, would be produced to swear that they were not there, and knew nothing of the transaction. This, gentlemen of the jury, is the nature of the case, and I think we will satisfy you that the prisoners

The following witnesses were then examined for the prosecution, in support of the facts detailed by Counsel Margaret Sullivan, Margaret Parker, Patrick O'Grady, Thomas Kelly, John Doody, the Right Hon. Earl of Dunraven, who proved the destruction of his property, and the receipt of a warning letter next day; Francis Kennedy, policeman; Constable M'Connell, James O'Regan, Patrick Hourigan, Patrick Sullivan, Michl. Kennelly, Thomas Hogden, policeman; Mr. James Wilson, gunmaker, of whom the fire-arms were bought; Ambrose Hall and Thomas Evans, from whom the ncendiary matches were bought; John Breen, Thos.
