

bill passed, there were many in Dublin unimpressed by commercial or professional duty—and he was one of that class—who would leave it, and go and reside elsewhere; and he was of opinion such men should be encouraged to live in Dublin. He candidly avowed that if the proposed bill became law he would on the next day, sell his house in Mountjoy-square, and abandon the metropolis, which he lived in perhaps more as a source of pleasure than otherwise, for there were other places that might better conduce to his feelings as more suitable residences (hear); and in saying so he could tell the government that he spoke not his own individual opinion, but the opinions of a large class of persons, whom he had conversed with on the subject; in fact, what he had put forward was the universal opinion that if the proposed bill passed, they could not reside in the city of Dublin.
