REMARKS ON

Cod Liver Oil.

IN THE JOURNAL OF MEDICINE, BY
C. B. WILLIAMS, M.D., of Holles st., London, Consulting Physician to the Hospital for Consumption, &c.

(See Journal of Medicine, No. 1.)

"I have prescribed Cod Liver Oil in above 400 cases of tuberculous disease of the Lungs, in different stages, which have been under my care in private practice during the last two years and a-half; of these I have 234 cases recorded in my note-book; out of this number, the Oil disagreed in only nine instances; in nineteen it appeared to do no good; whilst in the large proportion of 206 out of 234, its use was followed by marked and unequivocal improvement." After stating the particular action of the Oil on several of his patients, Dr. WILLIAMS goes on to state, "It seems scarcely necessary to discuss the question, whether the Oil owes its efficacy to the iodine which it contains. The amount of this element is so minute as hardly to admit of quantitative measurement; and to ascribe virtue to such infinitesimal fractions, when ordinary doses have no corresponding activity, is to adopt the fanciful and mischievous speculations of the homœopathist, which cannot be too strongly deprecated by the scientific and conscientious practitioner. Several of the patients whose cases are cited above, and many more of whom I have records, had taken iodine in various combinations before taking the oil, but without any effects approaching to those which ensued on the change of treatment. I am by no means incredulous of the salutary operation of iodine in some forms of tuberculous and scrofulous disease; indeed, until I used the pure oil, I considered it to be the most useful remedy; but in the last two years, the oil has so far surpassed it and every other medicine in beneficial operation, that I am convinced that it acts by a virtue peculiar to itself.

Pure Cod Liver Oil,

Of a singularly sweet and fresh flavour, is now prepared at Newfoundland (where neither possibility nor motive can exist for adulteration), by LANGTON, BROTHERS, & SCOTT, London, and it may be obtained of
